Down on old Kent Island,
Where the rocky-dock is sweet,
And where the waves of the bounding bay
The wooded shorelands meet.
Tis there the sportsmen gather,
When the winter air is cold,
To shoot the ducks as fleet and fat
As in the days of old.
Ere a' on the stars have gone to rest,
Or the sun has shown his face,
We're watching from behind the blinds
For the first fine feathery brace.
And, while the decoys are trilled
With morn's first golden rays,
The wounded shores are lighted
With the duck-gun's thunderous blast.
Hurting madly through the crisp air,
A dainty red-head falls,
And close behind, on linden wings,
A crippled cost-duck spraws.
Splash! and the dogs are breasting
The Chesapeake's chilly tide,
And scarce a moment's over
'Fore the ducks are at our side.
And, thus the sport goes onward,
As a heaving bill the air,
And another flock of dainties
Are enticed into our lair.

The Weekly Press Poem.
I have heard of Halley's comet and the tail protruding from it, and it surely is a hummer if the things I read are true; through the distant airy spaces it is straining in its traces, bound to reach its destination at the hour when its due. All the scientists in chorus, say the blamed thing's headed for us, by some strange unknown attraction to our little world its drawn; if it jolts against this planet we won't have much time to scan it, we'll be cooked and turned to ashes ere we know what's going on. It will, in a festive manner, swing its tail like some huge banner, o'er the surface of this globe; and there'll be a ghastly thud; this old world will fly to pieces like a flock of frightened geese, and we cannot save the fragments, so our names will all be mud. In this world of rush and hurry, men are given much to worry, over
