Letter from Baltimore.

BALTIMORE, March 6, 1878.

Your old correspondent was rather "wild" at the curt way by which I retired him from the notice of your readers, and he has requested me as a gentleman, and an intimate friend, to publicly apologize for my lack of courtesy, and finally bury him with these words - "that fluding his legitimate business fully occupying his attention he is forced to give up the pleasant task of informing you of some few things that occur within the confines of this city, and resigns to my abler pen the agreeable duty." I inserted the word abler after he had shook hands and left me; won't he "rare" if he ever reads it.

DAHLIAS FROM SEED.

The past spring, I sowed a few seed about the latter part of Match, in a bed prepared the same as for a hot-bed; but covered with pieces of plank in hea of a sash. As soon as the weather had sufficiently advanced they were transplanted to a rich flower border, where they grew very rapidly, and to my astonishment bloomed the last of June, for I was under the impression that they required two or three years to bloom from seed. The howers of these seedlings were not what could be wished in regard to doubleness of bloom, which fault I attribute to the greater part of the seed not germinating, as it is said by florists that the seeds that will produce single or semi-double flowers are more robust and sure to grow than those that will produce double ones. This is written more to show that this justly popular flower can be grown very easily from seed, and to the cattle and sheep. ahead, and as often behind time, had just will bloom almost as soon as plants bedas for Balsams.

The Dairy.

Preservation of Green Corn-Fodder, We had the pleasure one day last month of witnessing the very satisfactory results which have attended the preservation on a large scale according to the plan recommended by M. Goffart, the disinguished French agriculturist, frequently referred to in these pages, of green corn-fodder. Mr. Francis Maris, of Oakland, in Howard County, in this State, has for two years made essays in this important matter; and while the success of is first experiment was very gratifying, the present year's experience leaves nothing in doubt as to the practicability, economy and desirability of this process -one which so simplifies the problems meeting the dairy farmer in the winter. as to do away almost cathrely with the drawbacks usually attending that branch of husbandry, from a failure to secure succulent food for preserving in winter the flow of milk. Mr. Morris's plan of preserving the fodder aiffers from that describeded where the treaches are out of doors. In the basement of his capacious barn, between two of the supporting walls, he had two division walls built from the ground to the floor overhead, thus giving three narrow cell-like compartments of about four feet in width, twenty in depth and nine feet high. The fronts of these cells are closed by heavy doors in sections. The barn floor above them is so constructed as to be taken up, and the straw cutter is placed so that the fodder and straw as cut will fall at once into the celis.

The practice in filling the compartments is to cut enough straw in advance to mix with the fedder, the two materials being used in equal proportions. The straw cutter, one of the largest and a few remarks on some of our popular most effective sorts, is driven by a sixhorse sweep power, and enough straw can be cut in from an hour and a half to two hours for each cell. The cut straw is thrown to one side of the hatchways. which are then opened, and the fodder as hauled from the field is fed from the wagons to the cutter, and as cut is thrown at once through the hatchways into the cells below, hands on the opposite side throwing in the cut straw at the same time, and two men in the cells packing the whole compactly as possible by treading with their feet. As soon as the cell is filled to within a foot of the floor, a layer of earth of that thickness is thrown over the whole, and packed tightly down and rammed so as to exclude air. The hatchways are then put on, and the next compartment is then filled. By this plan the filling of one cell is completed in from four to five hours. In the first trial salt was added, but last year it was omitted -it not being considered as contributing to the preservation of the fodderbut a little is sprinkled over it when fed

As the process of fermentation goes on, ded out at the same time. Culture same the mass in the cells shrinks and declines Every few days more earth is added on the top and well rammed. Zembla is called on the old maps, there are four ways of reaching the Kara sea, the best of which seems to be the above named strait, a narrow but deep channel some thirty miles in length, and usually free from ice in the second half of July. This is the route which the Swedish navigator means to follow, and although he expects to be detained for some days by floating ice mas as in the Kara basin, there is no reason to place his arrival at Dickson Harbor-the entrance to the Yenisei-later than the middle of August. In 1875 he reached this point on the 15th of the month with a stilling ship, and might have gained a fortnight with a steamer.
