The base stands 35 ft. high Michael Hughes, aged 50 years. May she and 50 ft. square; on the lour sides are inscribed the dates of notable events taken from his life. From the base a handsome Doric column rises 165 ft. surmounted by a gallery, from which rises the pedestal and a colossal statue of Washington in the act of resigning his commission as Commander of the American armies. The visitor, after paying his fee, receives a lantern and begins the ascent. Round and round we go until our heads grow dizzy. Round and round, climbing higher and higher, until with a sigh of relief we step out upon the gallery, and a cry of delight we pay involuntarily to the sight we see around us. Having tried to describe something of the panorama of the city, seen with such flattering effect from that height in our first letter, we can only add, that the only fatality connected with the monument's history, occurred a few years ago, when a young man tired of life, leaped from the top, and was picked up a mass of flesh, bones and blood. There is a tradition fast fading away that a long, long time ago, two venturesome boys slid down the lightning rod. We don't vouch for the truth of this, but think it likely that like most traditions, they have placed the cart before the horse, and think it quite likely that two apprentices carried the rods up for the boss to place in position. Here we cannot but help regretting that we are compelled to state that the virginal purity and whiteness of the marble surface is besineared by legions of manufactures of the marble surface is besineared by legions of the marble surface is beginning the surface in the surface is better than the mongrel names scribbled over it.
