An old farm-house with meadows wide, And sweet with clover on each side;
A bright-eyed boy, who looks from out
The door with woodbine wreathed about,
And wishes this one thought all day;
"O, if I could but fly away From this cull spot, the world to see, How happy, happy, happy, How happy I should be !"

Amid the city's constant din, A man who round the world has been, Who, mid the tumult and the throng, Is thinking, thinking all day long; O could I only tread once more The field-path to the farm-house door, The old, green meadow could I see, How happy, happy, happy. How happy I should be:"

Jackson's Nerve in the Buel. I do not suppose that among all his truest friends there was to be found one who would say that Andrew Jackson ever sought to cultivate the spirit of meekness. Wayward, headstrong, and mischievous in his boyhood and early youth, his opening manhood was swayed by passions strong and deep, and in middle-age his own indomitable will was the law when he could make it so. Such a man must needs have enemies; and he had them most bitter and malignant. In 1806 he was mercilessly attacked by Charles Dickinson, of Nashviile. Knowing Dickinson's #5.05, 6.50, †7.40, $5.30, $10.00, $10.00 A. M., reckless, malevolent character, Jackson's 10.10, $1.30, $1.30, $1.40, $5.30 $10.50, political enemies sought to make use of $10, $10.15 P. M. him to fret and worry their powerful opponent. Jockson knew this, and he went to a man who was a friend of both parties, and asked him to beg of Dickinson to desist. "If he does not," said Jackson,

"it shall be worse for him." But instead of desisting, Dickinson became more and more abusive, and not satisfied with maligning Jackson himself, he opened his battery of foul slander upon Jackson's wife. The parties met on the morning of May 20th, upon the banks of the Red River, in Logan county,

Kentucky, to fight with pistols at the distance of eight paces. Not only was Charles Dickinson one of the most expert pistol shots in the country but it was known that he had speat several hours of each day, for more than two weeks, in preparation for this duel. His plan was to fire at the first breathing of the word, and he felt sure he should kill his man; such was his purpose, as he had
