the most circumstential that has reached us, the flag of the Huascar was shot away at twenty-five minutes past ten, and it was supposed that the vessel had surrendered. Much to the surprise of the Chilians, however, whose ships had stopped firing, and the men begun cheering over the victory, the Peruvian colors again ap peared, and the gallant Huascar, battered to pieces, and the better part of her people dead, hoisted the flag which had been intrusted to her valor, firing a blank cartridge to show that it was still there. The story runs that some of the sailors and machinists aboard the iron-clad thought that the time had arrived for surrender, and that further loss of life would simply be a sacrifice. Indeed, so far did they insist upon this idea as to endeavor to force Lieutenant Garezon to strike the colors. But this officer, putting a guard over the flig, and seeing that the end had arrived, descended to the engine-room and opened the valves, so that the water began to rush in, gradually submerging the vessel. Then came the boarding. The Chilians by main force took the ship, and according to one account, they hauled down the Peruvian flag after reaching it over a hecatomb of dead, dying, and wounded.
