A Relic of Druid Times. History books confidently assert that the Druids have long ceased to exist in England. Doubt is thrown on this assertion by a quaint custom held in the stormy dawn of a recent morning around the remnants of a British tumulus which exists at Knightlow, in Warwickshire, where the Duke of Buccleuch, as Lord of the Hundred, exacted payment of certain tributes which date from the misty times of our Druidical ancestors. The duke did not himself appear in the character of a Druid to collect the dues, but was represented by his agent. Payment is made by twentyeight parishes of the old Hundred of Knightlow, the tax being called "Wroth

What it was instituted for nobody knows and nobody exactly knows why it is maintained. It only produces about nine shillings, but if any parish neglects to pay, the duke has the right to exact from it a white bull with red nose and ears. The representatives of the different parishes must assemble at the tumulus on Nov. 11, march thrice round a hollow stone, saying "The Wroth money," and deposit the tribute in the cavity, from which the duke's representative gathers it up. A philologer after the school of Dean Swift's "Greek and Latin Derived from English" might explain the meaning of the name by saying that the parishes were "wroth" at having to pay it; but this etymology is at once muffled by the fact that inhabitants of the Hundred who care to get out of bed so early are entertained in a neighboring hostelry by his grace at a subst breakfast, costing twenty times more than they pay in "Wroth money." It is a curi-ous custom, linking the distant past with Nineteenth century civilization.—London

Criticism from a "Clubber." Some people, though not born humorists, were born to cause humor under certain circumstances. It was at the horse show that many people were pouring through the entrance and a crowd had blocked the space within the building proper. The hunters were performing and one horse who was acting unusually badly attracted the attention of the people who were entering the building so that they did not begin to look for their seats, but stood where they were to see what the outcome of the struggle between horse and rider would be. The olds seemed greatly in favor of the hunter until the rider, who probably knew very well with what material he had to deal, cut his steed a half dozen blows which were so keen and rapid in succession that the strokes cracked sharply all over the garden and startled

At that moment from the crowd within the entrance came a roar of indignation. "Stop that, you brute!" some one roared. "What are you hitting that horse for?" But when people realized who it was that had opened his lungs in defense of the vicious brute, there was a howl of laughter, for it was a great, broad shouldered, heavy policeman. He was armed with the usual deadly club, and no one failed to catch the humor of the situation where a giant of a policeman, ready at the slightest word to crack with his stick the skull of a man, objected to the lashing of an ill tempered horse. And that's why the crowd laughed, and why few people in that part of the building saw the hunter, now brought to his senses, take his next two jumps in beautiful shape.—New York Tribune.

Sparrow Farming in Kansas. On the bank of the Kaw river, about two miles above Lawrence, Kan., is a farm on which is probably the most unique busi The English sparrow has always been looked upon as an outlaw among birds and a pest to man, but J. D Norton has an eye to business, and thought there was money in the little birds if they were properly He got as many as he could collect and took them to his place, where he had arranged houses and corners for them to build their nests and propagate. All along the river there grows a tall weed which bears a seed especially liked by the birds, and the sparrows soon found it out and made their home contentedly on the

This was four years ago and the little fellows have multiplied in a marvelous

Mr. Norton is now reaping the benefit of his foresight, and is supplying the market with birds at good round prices. They are sold as sparrows at all seasons, but when they reach the tables of the first class hotels and restaurants in Kansas City, St. Louis and Chicago they become reedbirds and ricebirds, according to the season. The birds have accumulated by the thousands, and now the whole country is alive with them.

Mr. Norton has the business down to a system and does not flood the market with them, but sells just enough to keep the hotels scantily supplied, and thus keeps the price up. The birds multiply so rapidly that there is no danger of their being de populated.—Cor. Boston Globe.
