STARTED BY MAKING PAPER DOLLS.
 How a Paying Business Grew Up Around Three Young and Pretty Girls.
 About three years ago three girls, in the interior of this state, brought up in affluence, were suddenly deprived of their money, and it suited neither their tastes nor inclinations to go out of their homes, nor had they been educated in any special direction. They had skillful hands, however, and with these they got up paper dolls and put them in Buffalo shops for sale. These incidentally came to the notice of a stationer here, who supplied them with an ink-sary and a proposition to make these dolls and give him the exclusive control of their sale.
 Imagine the astonishment and bewilderment of these three housekeeping girls. They were, however, persuaded into the enterprise, and got together thirty housekeeping girls like themselves, who came to their house and helped them. This year they made and disposed of 8,000 paper dolls. The orders for the next year were larger than ever and had outgrown their home. They now engaged offices; the financial arrangement their mother took charge of, and the packing and shipping fell to the father. In the midst of all this preparation the firm failed, and they were left to struggle with discouragements and vicissitudes, as if they were in the great world indeed.
 Then came a proposition more astonishing than the last, which was to equip a novelty for an American bazaar in New York, a bazaar of Nations. London, and to three girls who believed themselves unknown outside of their homes. Then came letters and propositions from here and there, and their wonder grew. But their fingers kept pace, and they found themselves obliged to get larger offices, to give themselves a firm name, and until scarcely realized by themselves they found themselves swimming along gaily in the great current of trade.
 Now they added thirty more girls to their original thirty and their paper dolls all sorts of pretty and dainty articles in paper. Then they bethought them of giving a reception and showing what women's fingers could do in paper. The youngest of the trio had a pretty taste in dresses and an Easter fete, for such it proved to be, gained such renown that Cleveland begged for an exhibition of the same sort, after the manner of these two cities, who always covet one another's performances, and the other sisters went, taking their pretty things.
 By and by the paper house from which they bought their paper wondered who this, their best customer, was and what he did with such quantities of colored papers. This curiosity was carried to the point of finding out. Imagine the firm's surprise. Three young and pretty girls, installed in one of the handsomest office buildings in the town, and surrounded by sixty more girls like unto themselves, were transforming their paper into banks of carnations, trailing vines of purple clematis, masses of peonies, jonquils and tulips, violets and sweet peas, butterflies with gilded wings, bouquets and powder puff bags, dressing table even dressed in paper, and glove cases, each paper or box, all of paper, and here was an idea, and this firm whose commercial instinct was alert, immediately invited these young women to give displays of their work at their branch houses in different cities, and thus they made visits of triumph to Boston, Philadelphia, Chicago, Milwaukee. The workrooms have grown again and they now employ from 80 to 100 assistants. "Mamma is still our business manager," writes one of these in a friendly letter, "and we are happy also in having been of service to so many of our friends, obliged to earn money as we were, but with no previous preparation."—New York Sun.
