THE PRINCE AT THE PLAY.
 How His Royal Highness Attends the English Theater.
 The royal box is looked in the usual way of business and charged to the Marlborough house account. The price is not increased from the ordinary literary tariff, and the stories told about a nominal price or a larger one being paid by royalty only exist in the imagination of the papers who invent such tarradiddles. Sometimes it happens that a box cannot be got at the particular theater decided upon. When this is the case it is put nicely to the party who has booked the royal box if they could see their way to obliging his royal highness, and the result is of course invariably in the affirmative. The prince, however, is very reluctant to have this done, and always wishes that the party obliging shall be as little inconvenienced as possible—so much so that when told that the box has been conceded he generally remarks: "Why do you disturb anybody on my account? I could have come here another evening. Please see how you are thanked in my name." In the rare case of a refusal representation is made to his royal highness, and they try for a box at another theater.
 If he goes to a theater it is his expressed desire to be treated exactly the same as one of the ordinary audience. Little displays of flowers, bouquets, satin programmes, etc., are all very nice, but the prince does not care for them, and would rather have them do without them. Another thing which annoys him is that he should be drawn attention to by the performance on his arrival of the national anthem or "God Bless the Prince of Wales."
 As soon as the royal box became occupied everybody seemed to see the orchestra suddenly stand up in the middle of the performance and begin playing "God Bless the Prince of Wales." Of course the whole house rose en masse, every eye was directed to the royal box, and a hush came over the audience. The prince immediately left the box and demanded an explanation. Mr. Jarritt arrived and explained that it was only the overzealousness of a too patriotic band conductor. This conduct he incidentally held in contempt as a precedent, and the same intimated to the managers generally. This is why you often hear people say in a theater toward the close of the performance: "Why, there is the Prince of Wales over there in a box, and they never played 'God Save the Queen.' What a blunder!"
 The prince always waits until the final curtain has descended before rising to leave. This is his invariable rule. So much so that he has sat out the entire performance of a Drury Lane pantomime, and on three or four theaters only where he ever breaks this rule. They are those houses which have no royal entrance, and here the prince anticipates the final curtain by two or three minutes, so that his departure will not do any harm to the carriage of the remainder of the audience.
 Immediately the prince is announced to have visited a theater the looking rises, harmonically, to a good height. This is in reference to the looking public, but beyond that his royal highness likes a play he invariably recommends it to all his friends. In many other ways the prince is always thinking of the drama. When he sees a benefit announced for some well known artist who has of late withered to his amusement, or some poor player who has fallen on bad times, he immediately puts his name down for stalls or boxes to a substantial amount.—London Morning Post.

THE FOXY NO WITHOUT HIS USE.
 Isn't it about time that some one attempted a defense of the "old foggy"? In these days there is no more derided. He is popularly supposed to block the wheels of enterprise, to stand in the way of progress, and nearly every association has two or three of these people whom the members would gladly throw overboard if they could. The old foggy has usually been one of the creators of the very body which seeks to be rid of him. In the beginning he was indefatigable; he labored long and earnestly to procure funds, and was at considerable personal sacrifice to put this or that into the world.
 Now that things are finally settled and paid for and everything is in good running order he is disposed to let well enough alone for a little time. But this will not do at all for the young blood who is constantly pouring in. The new element is full of progressive ideas and suggestions of innovations, and when it meets resistance on the part of the "old foggy" there is a clashing of opinions.—Buffalo Courier.

How to Light a Solid Body.
 Cadogan Morgan was the first electrician to experiment with electric light in solid bodies. This was in 1783. He first inserted two wires into a stick of wood and caused the spark to pass between them. This had the effect of illuminating the stick in a beautiful blood red. An ivory ball, an orange or any other material could be brought into use for this purpose, it being very susceptible to the electric discharge, flashing forth at every spark as a spheroid of brilliant golden light. The wires used for this purpose should be either within or about half an inch of each other inside the solid.—St. Louis Republic.

Mr. G. S. Mason, 184 Hiron St., Toledo, O., writes to make his views thorough believed in what he says. He writes from his home "Salvation Oil" only costs 25 cents and I want to state to you that myself and wife have used it times what cost. One and a half bottles cured my wife of a bad case of rheumatism this week."
GOOD ADVICE.—The editor of the West Branch, Iowa Record, gives his readers some good advice: "We have used Chamberlain's Cough Remedy in our family in cases of sudden colds and sore throat and find it all that is claimed for it. In a bottle or less, if taken according to directions, will, we believe, effect a cure in any ordinary case and save the expense of large doctor bills. Especially do we recommend it in families where the children are threatened with croup, as it will afford immediate relief, if taken in time which can always be done if the medicine is kept on hand, as we are convinced it is. It is for sale by Walter R. Rudy, M. A. Fry, and A. C. Taylor, Ellicott City."

LIFELONG FRIENDS.
 THE STRANGE FRIENDSHIP OF EMERSON AND CARLYLE.
 Their Views Were Almost Diametrically Opposed—Dissimilar Temperament—Great Tastes—Dilapidated—Each Other as Thinkers, but Loved as Men.
 The friendship of Goethe and Schiller, of Beaumont and Fletcher, of Irving and Paulding, of Socrates and Plato, have often been noticed as anomalous friendships of literary or philosophical minds.
 But perhaps one of the strangest literary friendships was the lifelong intimacy between Emerson and Carlyle.
 This intimacy was not fostered by personal contact, for Emerson and Carlyle met each other only two or three occasions. All their lives a wide ocean of space divided them, and a wide ocean of tastes and temperament. It would be hard to find two men who were more totally unlike. Carlyle was fierce, tumultuous, the most terrific scold in all history. Emerson was mild and benignant as an afternoon in September. Carlyle frowned like a thunder cloud, and Emerson glowed like a sunbeam.
 Carlyle seemed to despair of the future of the race and believed that the crazy old world was rattling on the down grade to destruction. Emerson was one of the most persistent optimists in all history. The past looked grim to him, the present looked grand and the future looked grander. Carlyle's style was jerky, explosive and smashed together like a railroad wreck. Emerson's style was compact, smooth and epigrammatic. Carlyle wrote long histories like "Frederick the Great" and the "French Revolution," which read like a long drawn out series of spasms, as if the author's pen was afflicted with the St. Vitus dance. Emerson wrote short, compact essays, in which every thought was packed in the smallest possible compass.
 The views of these two men were almost diametrically opposed. Carlyle, especially in his later days, seemed to believe in an absolute monarchy. He admired the czar of Russia. His great historical heroes were more often great men with a hand of iron. Emerson was a firm champion of republican institutions.
 Both Emerson and Carlyle were senile invalids all their lives. But Emerson's invalidism only served to draw out the latent sunshine of his nature. The more he was chastened by disease the sweeter grew his disposition. Carlyle's invalidism made him rage like a caged tiger. All his life long he thundered lurid denunciations at his own stomach. Emerson wished to be known as a lover of men; Carlyle called the public "mosty fools."
 Yet these two men, so dissimilar in their tastes and temperaments, maintained a lifelong friendship, and in fact Emerson and Edward Irving were about the only men of this generation that Carlyle ever spoke of with respect.
 "Sartor Resartus," Carlyle's first lengthy work and probably his masterpiece, was first brought out, in book form, in America. Edward Irving was the first words of warm appreciation that the book received came from this side of the Atlantic. In England it was received with gibes and sneers and contempt. It was, and still remains, one of the strongest books that have ever been written, but it is full charged with Carlyle's volcanic and dynamic genius. Emerson was one of the first to appreciate this genius and help to find it a public.
 All of Carlyle's successive books as they appeared found a warm admirer in Emerson, though he must have violently disagreed with many of their sentiments.
 A perpetual correspondence was kept up between the two men. In this correspondence Emerson was at his best, and Carlyle never was more characteristically than in his letters to Emerson. He must have, in his most heart, despised the theories and thoughts expressed in Emerson's books, for his whole life was a battle against these theories and thoughts. But in spite of this radical difference of ideas there was something about the man he liked. Emerson must have abominated many of the expressed opinions of Carlyle, and yet he was powerfully impressed by Carlyle's personality.
 They both hated each other as thinkers, but loved each other as men.
 This friendship ought to demonstrate that the strongest attachments grow up sometimes between men of entirely divergent tendencies of thought. Men seek their opposites for friends as they seek their opposites for wives. It is easy for one man to like and respect another man without agreeing with him. It is possible, however, that if Emerson and Carlyle had been thrown into closer intimacy they would not have continued their friendship so long.
 Carlyle was not an easy man to live with, as his own wife discovered to her sorrow. He became a chronic scold. He found fault with his food. He scolded if a draft of air blew too rudely upon his cheek. He was mad if a dog barked, a cat mewled or a hen cackled. He hated all his neighbors inversely as he loved himself. And genius as he was, his style seems to indicate that he loved himself very intensely. Emerson, on the other hand, may be written as one who loved his fellow man. Humanity had so large a place in his universe that there was no room for self.
 Not a pleasant man to live with for a term of years was Thomas Carlyle. It is doubtful if the many temperamental Emerson could have maintained his attachment if brought in constant contact with such a human bear.—S. Watters: Ford in Yankee Blade.

Making a Monkey Useful.
 A cook on board ship taught his monkey to hand the wood, and in other ways to assist him in doing the kitchen work. African apes, when they go in a body to plant gardens and plantations, are adroit enough to station a sentinel in a tree, who informs the plunderers of the approach of any person by uttering a shriek.—Harper's Young People.
