The following graphic statement will be read with intense interest: "I cannot describe the number, or even the nature, of the enemies that I have made in my life. I had been doctoring a year and a half, and I had taken possession of them. In addition, I had a strange weakness in my back and around my waist, together with an indigestible feeling in my stomach. Physicians said it was a nervous ailment, and that, according to the universal conclusion, there is no relief. Once it fastens upon a person, they say, it continues its insidious progress until it reaches a vital point and the sufferer dies. Such was my case.
