THE THIRD TIME

John and Elsie had been engaged for a couple of years, and finally decided they were well enough off in material affairs to have the knot tied for good.

ranged it until they had returned from So John built his cottage, while Elsie was busied about carpets and linens, and all went merry as the marriage bell that was soon to ring.

The day before that set for the wedding John and Elsie went to their cottage with several friends to take a general survey. Their "house warming" was to be after the wedding and trip in the good old fashioned way. John had bought a beautiful sideboard for the little dining-room, and as sideboards were not common furniture in the village this one caused much friendly comment and criticism. John placed it at one side of the room. "It would be much prettier over here,"

"Now, why?" questioned John. "Well, it would show more from the other room and have a good light, too," she replied. "But it would throw the room all out of proportion," said he. "The table goes here, and the stove there, and you see now how huddled up the room would look with the sideboard where you want "I do not think so," returned Elsie, although she did, and John looked at her in astonishment. "Just see how from here how pretty it would look."

"Pshaw!" said John testily, women never see but one thing at a time. The sideboad will stay where it iz." They had been engaged so long they did not have that fear of being misunderstood so characteristic of short acquaintances. Doubtless Elsie would not have thought again of his remark, but would have waited her opportunity to move the sideboard to suit herself and either convince him or be convinced herself, had not one of their female friends "It's plain to see who is going to rule in this house!" It rankled with Elsie. She was the one, she thought, who should have the say in such matters, and the longer she hought the worse it looked and the nore tyrannical seemed her soon to be nusband. It was too late to break the engagement, for every detail of the wedding was arranged for the next day.

So the morrow found a tasteful bride, but in the gladness of his heart John never noticed her constraint and quiet-ness. A bride is always expected to be tearful and solemn, and Elsie, with her white dress and veil and traditional orange blossoms, was an ideal bride and one of whom any man might well be John made his responses with a hearty good will, and then the minister turned to Elsie and asked her the usual uestion. "No!" answered Elsie, and the minister started. He was slightly deaf and leaned forward to assure himself he was not mistaken. "I did not understand you, my dear," said the good old man.

"No!" repeated Elsie in clear, ringing ones, and John's confusion was great. He flushed and paled, then turned and walked deliberately out of the church while Elsie smiled triumphantly in the crowd to weep in grief when at last done. Her ruler was gone; but, oh, how sorry she was! It was the sensation of the country Nobody knew what had become of John, and Elsie staid closely at home. One day, just four weeks afterward, John came walking up to Elsie's door, and she flew out to meet him. He told her he had made his intended honeymoon trip all alone, but it was lonesome, and he came back to see if she would not try it over again and take the trip with him. She said she would, and then timidly asked if she might move the sideboard when they came back. He told her certainly, and he would help her; it was too heavy to move alone. And just as the villagers were recovering from the sensation of the unfinished wedding they received an invitation to see it repeated This time, blushing and smiling, Elsie was led to the altar. It was a double niumph. Surely he was a lover true and hold who would remain thus constant after such a mortifying experience. When the good old minister asked John f he would take this woman to be his wedded wife, the answer was a resound ing distinct "No!"

The minister could not be mistaken, John's answer could be heard outside he church door. "What means this trifling with sacred hings?" cried the good man in rightcous

"Revengel" quoth John dramatically and he strode out of the church, while poor Elsie, thoroughly punished, fell in John went away again, and months rolled on and on, until two years had passed, and he had never come back, nor did anybody hear from him Elsie had the key to the cottage, and she locked it with everything in it, but she moved the sideboard to suit herself first. At the end of two years John came back and walked up to Elsie's door ngain. In her heart she had expected him all the time, although she had never allowed herself to think of it. "How do you do John!" said she, but she did not ask him in.

"Pretty well, Elsie, and so are you, I see," he returned, and there was a little twinkle in his blue eyes. "I guess we are about eyen, aren't we, Elsie?"

"I believe we are," she answered, but there was pain in her pretty brown

"I wish, though, we had got married that first time," he said gravely "So do 11 Oh, John, I did wrong!" and then she began to cry and held the door open for him to come in. They had a third wedding day, and ing, so long delayed, was over. Then Elsie wanted John to help her arrange it his way. "The room does look better with it so," she admitted, and thereafter it was very hard to say which was the more subm
