AMERICA'S RICHEST MAN. HE IS JOHN D. ROCKEFELLER, THE STANDARD OIL KING.

He is now worth more than a Hundred Millions, and His Income is Estimated to be Over Forty Thousand Dollars a Day. New York, January 26.—What does the richest man in this country do in a day? John D. Rockefeller, the Standard Oil King, is the man. His fortune has now reached the gigantic figure of $145,000,000. Before the end of the year it will have reached the terrific sum of one hundred and fifty millions.

Mr. Rockefeller's income is unquestionably somewhere in the neighborhood of fifteen million a year. The Standard Oil Company pays immense profits to its owners, and Mr. Rockefeller is the principal owner. Based upon an annual income of fifteen millions a year, the Oil King has $1,500,000 a month to spend, or $11,500 every day in the week, including Sundays and holidays.

Mr. Rockefeller is not an indiscriminate philanthropist. All of his charities tend in the direction of religion or education. Consequently, not one out of fifty of the charities in his office have their wishes gratified. Mr. Rockefeller always lunches in his office, and spends his afternoon until about 4 o'clock over reports and dictating instructions.

At four o'clock he starts uptown, usually walking all the way home. If the foot of the city is too far to go, he is brought, which invariably meets him on the street. He dines plainly at six o'clock, and seldom goes out in the evening, unless it is to attend some important church meeting. He goes very little into society, and is very rarely seen at the theater or opera.

Mr. Rockefeller is methodical in everything. He gets up at seven in the morning and breakfasts with his wife and two daughters, Alva and Edith, and his son, John D., Jr., at eight o'clock. At nine o'clock he starts for his downtown office. The Rockefeller home is on the southeast corner of Fifth and Broadway streets, and overlooks the park fronting St. Luke's Hospital on the opposite side of the street.

Mr. Rockefeller is a great believer in the efficacy of walking, and all kinds of exercise as health givers, and he makes it a point to walk with his family to believe the same. After a three or four-mile tramp in the park, Mr. Rockefeller turns back to Fifth avenue and walks down to Green Street, and then to his office. Frequently he walks all the way down to the office, a distance of four and a half miles, and he sometimes accompanied by his son or by his brother, William Rockefeller, who is also one of the Standard Oil princes.

Mr. Rockefeller can walk the whole distance from his home to his office without meeting a single acquaintance. He has never figured in public life, and he has never been in politics, and he has studiously avoided meeting people, thus making of himself the least known millionaire in the metropolis. His clothes have an appearance of the most ordinary, and in every way this modern Croesus looks the plain, ordinary business man.

Arriving at the building of the Standard Oil Company, which overlooks the historic Bowling Green, Mr. Rockefeller goes at once to his suite of private offices. There he is met by his two private secretaries. One of these secretaries is a young man, who is the son of the man who called with the intention of seeing the Oil King. Many of these callers have been referred to the Standard Oil Company, and how they would act favorably impress the millionaire, only to be met by the polite but firm secretary, who in very few words, turns the caller homeward disappointed.

in operation on the lines mapped out. He mentioned the matter to Mr. Rockefeller in the hope that it would draw a goodly subscription from the millionaires of the city. Mr. Rockefeller investigated, and it seemed feasible as an agency for accomplishing much good.

He said nothing more about the matter until the arrival of Christmas Day. Then he called at the parlance of the church. After wishing Dr. MacArthur the customary compliments of the season, he broached the subject of the mission. He said that he was anxious to do it to its utility, and was prepared to make a subscription if the pastor would promise not to say one word about it to any one else.

Consequently, not one out of fifty of the charities in his office have their wishes gratified.
