AERIAL TELEGRAPHY. The Buzzards May Have a Method of Signaling Peculiar to Themselves. "A great many interesting facts have been brought to light concerning that despised but heaven-sent scavenger, the buzzard, by recent investigations in regard to aerial navigation," writes a correspondent, "and I am inclined to believe still more would reward the patient searcher after truth. The buzard is an awkward, ungainly, repulsive creature on foot, simply because he is out of his element. He is at home only in the upper circles, and, when his work of charity below is done, he at once begins to ascend.

"This he does by a succession of gawky jumps and springs which bring a pressure of air upon his wings, when he mounts right royally. The flapping of his long pinions ceases so soon as he reaches a desired plane of air, upon which he floats leisurely, the perfection of grace in all his movements, with scarce a motion of his wings as they glint and glisten like burnished silver in the sunlight of a clear day The very king and queen and all the royal family he is of realms aerial, and it is no wonder that we earth bound creatures have begun to sigh for the soft seductions of his sphere.

"A recent sojourn in the treeless region of Southwest Texas brought me into pretty intimate relationship with this bird of the desert, and I took advantage of ample opportunity to improve the acquaintance. One day, as I was riding leisurely along over the arid, sunburnt prairie, I saw suddenly a solitary buzzard dropping himself down upon the untouched carcass of a young calf. He had evidently only come upon a tour of inspection, and did not mean to enjoy the feast alone, for after a few preliminary pecks he swung himself aloft again, circling around overhead, with now and then a graceful sweep of his long wings, or a side-long dip of his

"Over all that vast treeless waste, so far as my eye could pierce the clear telescoping atmosphere, he was the only winged creature in sight. Round and round he swung, seeming to mount from one plane of air to another, but describing only a very small circle. Suddenly, a tiny speck appeared above the horizon far to the westward, then another and another and they all three came sailing through the aerial sea, growing into buzzards as they came. Then came others from north and south and east till I counted twenty in all, when they dropped down and demolished the dead calf in short order. What to use in this instance, except a system of aerial telegraphy of which we as yet know nothing?" Humor Defined.

He was such a healthy-looking cheerful-kind of a tramp that when the lady of the house opened the kitchen door to his knock she was almost glad to see "Have you any work I can do, lady?"

he said, touching his hat. "Yes, I have," she replied very prompt ". "The hired girl left this morning

"Excuse me, lady," he interrupted, with a smile, "but I can't cook nor do housework," and he looked down over his ragged habiliments and smiled again. "No, I suppose not," she laughed, but there is coal to carry, the walks to e swept off, some kindling to be chop ped, that barrel over there in the corner of the yard to be filled with water, and that loose ice along there by the porch to be dragged out of the way, besides

The tramp took a long breath.

"All right, lady," he said, "but before I begin, can't you give me a bite to eat?"

She could, she said, and she did, and after he had stowed away a liberal allow ance of provender he drew his sleeve across his mouth and got up from the kitchen table. "Now, lady," he inquired, "when do you want me to begin?" "Right away, and bring in the coal first. You'll find four empty scuttles out by the door.' The tramp set to work forthwith, and n an hour or so he had done everything to be done, and had put on some extra finishings touches for good measure. Then he smiled and bowed and said "good-day," and departed with a quarter in his pocket, besides the dinner n his interior.

Postscript—As humor is defined as exaggeration, this story is told as a humorous one, inasmuch as it is an exaggeration which is quite beyond the limit of all known facts concerning the leading character in it.—Detroit Free A Live Beetle in Iron Ore.

Z. T. White, who is now, or has very recently been a citizen of El l'aso, Tex., was once the owner of the most wonderful entomological specimen ever found since the creation of the world-a live beetle found in a solid matrix of iron ore! The curiosity was discovered a considerable depth below the surface in the Longfellow mine, at Clifton, Ariz., and fitted his iron sarcophagus as snugly as though the iron had been in plastic state when it came in contact with the creature's body. The "bug' was of a dull, reddish-gray color, and was, of course, of a species wholly unknown to the entomologists. Accord ing to the El Paso Bulletin, this wonder was presented to a well-known scientific association of the Atlantic slope abou two years ago.

Fixing the Value. Maurice Thompson tells of a certain buyer of sheep who went into the mount ains of eastern Kentucky, where the following dramatic incident took place between him and a grim mountainee who had one ewe for sale; Buyer-That ewe is worth about seventy-five cents.

Mountaineer-Hit air wo'th just dollar 'n 'er half. Buyer-You are joking; the old thing Mountaineer (drawing a huge pistol and cocking it)-Stranger, w'at did ye say 'at that air ewe was wo'th?
Buyer (briskly)—Nigh on to $7 i what I said .- Cincinnati Tribune.

The passenger came out of the smoke nto the parlor car and sat down by the first man he came to. "By George," he said, "there's a fellow out there can tell stories that will make your hair stand on end." "I'll give him a hundred dollars if I can," replied the other party. "Well, he can; you just go out there and listen to him."

"Savin' de right thing at de right time," said Uncle Eben, "am er great gif'. But not sayin' anything at de right time am mos' ez good an' or heap mo' reli'ble."-Washington Star.

"Do you think so?" smiled the other party, removing his hat and showing a head like a hilliard ball.—Detroit Free
