THE OWL AND JAY.
One a Devil by Night and the Other a Veritable Scoundrel in Feathers.
Mr. Frank Bolles, who was a friend to the birds and a close student of their ways, has left us in his sketches a legacy of value and profit in his close observation of his feathered friends. He has given us many an estimate of their qualities, and viewed with his eyes, they more or less resembled humans. He made an especial study of the owl, and he depicts the bird in his "Bird Traits in none too glowing colors."
"The owl reminds me," says Mr.
Bolles, "of some men whom I have had the misfortune to know—silent and sinister by day or when exposed to the scrutiny of their fellows; taking without reply or blow the taunts and abuse of those whom they have wronged; but by night devils in thought, purpose and action. To the owl everything which possesses the power of motion is, presumably, fit to be devoured—quadruped, bird, fish, reptile, insect, mollusk, any or all, unless specially protected, invited to murder; so with some men nothing is too pure, too beautiful, too defenseless to be sacrificed to their selfishness.
One owl is enough for many miles of forest. Fortunately for society, owlish men are similarly scarce." Continuing his discussion of the birds of less attractive character, Mr. Bolles thus speaks of the jay:
"There are some birds of deservedly bad repute who wear an attractive exterior and maintain jaunty manners.
The blue jay, for instance, though somewhat flashy in his dress and proud in his voice, passes with the unsuspecting as a model of confidence and self-reliance.
Don't snub a boy because of his admiration. Yet, if there ever was a scoundrel in feathers, he is one. He is my ideal pickpocket, shoplifter, swaggerer and confidence man. Most people think his cousin, the crow, an undoubted villain; yet he is considerably better off in morals than his jay-dressed relative.
This is not saying that the crow is not a blackleg."
