Sirs:

The Grand Jury would respectfully submit for your consideration the following report:

The Grand Jury has been in session six days in the discharge of the business committed to it; during which time they have examined forty-eight witnesses, resulting in the finding of nine indictments; in addition to which they investigated a number of cases, resulting in dismissal.

The Grand Jury through its committee visited the office of the Board of County Commissioners for Howard County and in their judgment found matters there to be in a most excellent condition, everything being done in a thoroughly sys ematic manner and done in a thoroughly sys ematte manner and far superior to old methods.

The committee were courteously received in the office of the School Board by the Rev. II. O. Devries and the Examiner, and found everything pertaining to the office in excellent shape.

The offices of the Clerk of the Court and Register of Wills were then visited, the licenses examined and found to be correct and everything kept in first class condition. The Grand Jury has visited the Jail, were received courtcoasly and entertained by the efficient Warden. A thorough inspection was made and everything found to be kept in a neat and fide manner.

In his latest effort, Mr. Editor, "Junius" again poses as critic, and gives a dissertation on "prose" and "poetry," and the "grade" to which certain correspondents should be assigned. His force of habit crops out when he proceeds to distribute the awards of the pedagogue as very ill with pneumonia is improving "dunce," "semi educated," &c.; but while calling names, he accepts Marcus Brutus as his own prototype, and, with the playwright, declares him "the noblest Roman of them all". His habits having been to stab his superiors in the back, and to sling mud whenever an opportunity offered,

"REGULAR" TALK'S TO "JUNIUS".

"Junius" is truthful for once, when he admits he is the reflection of Caesar's as-

But "Junius" seriously objects to the name usually applied to "the friend of man", forgetting that in this entire correspondence of both "prose" and "poetry" the diminutive has ever been used. For, it would be preposterous to attribute anything like friendliness to the obstreperous little protege of The Democrat Whilst "Junius" may imagine that he owns that paper, that he will be sent to Annapolis to frame tramp laws, or, that he has innumerable wheels in his headsensible folks see and know that he is exclusively the property of The Democrat; and that his tricks as "prestidigitator", thermo frigid blower and "Dis cussions", are far superior, as an attraction, of those in quest of the ludicrous to any Punch and Judy ever put upor exhibition. As a pedagogue, "Junius" should not show his teeth when metaphor or simile is used in "prose" or "poetry" to emphasize attributes peculiarly his own. If Webster can say of Hamilton's ability as a financier: "He smote the Rock of national resources, and an abundant stream burst forth. He touched the dead Corpse of national credit, and it sprang upon its feet". Or, if a certain senator is figuratively called the Watch Dog of the Treasury, why should "Jun-ius" rage when a like figure is applied to the zealous guardian of The Democrat? Now it is to be sincerely hoped that he will not fly at Webster's grammar, but answer the plain question, has he not all along exhibited the peculiarities attributed to him? As to "Cassius-the lean and hungry" the simile is inant, because "Regular" revels amid the luxuries of the country, is local habitation, and tips the scales at two hundred. His "palms" having been hardened by honest toil, he is independent of the public crib. He is entirey exempt from all "itching", and to so emain, he will ever avoid proximity to Junius" and his kennel.

Furthermore, the only "Master" ever cnown to "Regular", was a gentleman of the old school, who never neglected his pedagogic duties to raise a row with public functionaries, or to maligu a faithul servant who has thrice proven his 'fealty to the principles of Democracy.' But since "Junius" has wisely concluded to retire to his corner and give the oublic a rest, an apology is due you. Mr. Editor, for the "prose" and poetry", not dignified indeed, which have been elicit ed by this turbulent howler. Hoping, that in his retirement, he may realize:

"Anger and wrong are both unwise;— Vinegar never catches flies: and that while he growes fat and fatter upon the taxes of a tramp haunted people, he may in the same degree increase in amiability and other virtues. Then t him be assured, in the language o classic verse, again.

"I like to see a doggie good And pat him on his head. How prettily he wags his tail Whenever he is fed". Howard County, March 27, 1895.

HIS FAILURE TO CONVINCE.

EDITOR TIMES: That mysterious personage who for the last two months has been writing in one of our local papers under the nom de plume of "Junius" has thrown up the sponge and retires, hors du combat." His signal failure to convince the people of Howard of his political honesty, and disinterestedness in our affairs, has almost broken his mighty heart. In his exile from his beloved people he can calmly muse of the past and shed a tear over the ingratitence of mankind. Poor fellow, he has this consolation; that he is not the first who has been forced to leave his country for his country's good. He leaves behind him a pseudonym shrouded in mystery, a veritable crux criticorum. His beautiful literary gems will by future historians be variously assigned. Some will say they were written by Editor Melvin, some by Lawyer Murray and again some will be positively declared to be the production of Sir John T. Tompson. Howard county is prolific in great men. One of the great astronomical observers and calculators of the last century was a full-blooded negro who resided and died near Ellicott City. He, too, was not properly appreciated, but his name and works live after him. Don't take it toe much to heart, "Junius." "It has always been so.' Mayfield, March 27, 1895. WATCHMAN.

HARRIS' ACADEMY OF MUSIC,

Week of April 1 - Richar Golden's Farewell of "Old Jed". Richard Golden in "Old Jed Prouty" is the important attraction at the Academy of Music, Baltimore, for the next six evenings. Golden's Bucksportain appears to have acquired a distinction which is on a par with that attained by the late John E. Owens in 'Solen Shingle" and with that of the contemporaneous Denman Thompson in "The Old Homestead". Golden's success with Old Jed Prouty, has long been a settled fact, otherwise his management might not have been so bold his management might not have been so bold recently as to place him again in the play to the extent they have done. We are to infer the importance with which "Old Jed Prouty" is going to be repeated here by the mature of the advance advertising. The auxiliaries will be of the genuine statup. The actors will hail from the backwoods with the realistic "hayseed" in their hair. Altogether the production will be tuily as complete as when originally seen here two or three scasons ago.
