A CITY UNDER ONE ROOF.

The Alarming Possibilities of Sky-Scrapping Architecture.

In Chicago during the past year several sky-scrapers were erected.

The Marquette Building, at the southwest corner Clark and Monroe, is rapidly approaching completion.

The Fort Dearborn Building, at the southwest corner Clark and Monroe, is rapidly approaching completion.

The fourteen-story Reliance Building, located on the southwest corner of State and Washington streets, is practically completed.

These buildings, constantly increasing in size and height, suggest still greater achievements.

Practical architects admit that it is possible to put a complete city under one roof.

The century closes such an architectural miracle will be attempted in the Eastern metropolis.

Indeed, a rumor is printed in the New York Journal that the entire block at the corner of West Nineteenth street and Fifth avenue, stretching east, has been bought up by a secret syndicate of benevolent millionaires.

It is hinted that Charles T. Yerkes is one of the guiding spirits in this tremendous enterprise.

Yerkes is well known to the scientific world as the giver of the famous Yerkes telescope, and it is easy to understand how a man of his practical mind might be fascinated by the prospect which this gigantic scheme presents.

Who the New Yorkers are connected with the Chicago business genius in this plan, which involves millions to start, can only be surmised.

But what does the plan actually propose? According to the best obtainable information from inside sources, it may unless the magnificent intention collapses, eventuate something like this: Every building on the block will be torn down, and an absolute amphitheater, big enough for a football amphitheater, will be thus laid open in the fashionable heart of the city.

The foundations will be dug very deep, and the walls will be wrought from iron interspersed with aluminum, with glass and with stone for pictorial effect.

It is intended that the construction of this building will be a huge oval shell, with a spacious court, hotel, theater and spiral driving park of gradual ascent in the center.

The arrangement will be such that the main floor on each side of this imperceptibly ascending spiral avenue can be thrown open to natural air, while in severe winter months they can be closed tight.

The lower part of the huge oval shell will be arranged chiefly for the management of wholesale business, and the upper part for retail.

Consider now the food bills of these 2,500 families, who will be supplied from the great central restaurant.

The food bills will not be less than another $2,000,000 per annum, half of which, or more, may be reckoned as sheer, clear profit.

Consider next that the stores, Turkish baths, theaters, etc., in this place will be owned and managed by the company, and that in addition to the constant profit accruing from those who live in the city will be the stream of traffic from the outside.

For is it not clear that outsiders will come in floods to a place where not only everything is cheap, but where, elsewhere, according to quality, but where so much tremendous architectural beauty is set off by such unimaginable splendor of electric lights, shifting through all tints.

It should be added that besides the spiral driving park, which will be large enough for five platoons to move abreast, there will be several glass and aluminum aerial lobbies or reservoirs on different floors of the central dome, into which water from artesian wells will flow.

These will be lined with grassy lawns, flowers and trees, and little bath-houses, looking like the main floor, sprinkled here and there on the borders.

Some of these will be so arranged that in sufficiently wintry weather they can be thrown open, and absolutely perfect skating rinks thus formed.

THE FATAL EASTER EGGS.

A French Legend.

Several centuries ago it was generally believed that on Easter morning, at the sound of sweet bells chiming through the sunlit air, fair angels, with azure wings, descended from heaven bearing baskets of eggs, which they placed in the homes of faithful and worthy persons.

Such a one forms the story of an ancient legend of France.

It seems there lived in a village a widow with a dear and beautiful daughter, named Jeanne, who was beloved for her many virtues by both rich and poor.

She used to visit the hovels of the unfortunate and the sick to relieve their troubles and care for their distresses, for which she received their blessings and devotion.

One Easter morning when returning from early mass, Jeanne met an old beggar woman, who asked for alms.

Jeanne gave her what she had, and the stranger passed through her ragged hood at the pretty young girl, saying: "Beautiful damsel, do not disdain the gift of a poor beggar. Take this egg, and before it has twelve months, it will bring you a handsome nobleman who will ask for you in marriage. You will become a great lady. It is written in the book of fate. On your wedding day, I will be present, and this egg will contain a nuptial present."

Jeanne took the large scarlet egg, and laughed a little at the prediction as she placed it in a basket; yet, the possession of this gift of the famous old woman contented mind, and visions of pleasure, luxury and ambition filled her thought by day and by night.

Not far from the village rose the towers of an old castle, which had long remained untenanted, but within this year a young knight arrived at its gates, proudly he himself heir to the estate, and he was the nobleman who had been mentioned in the book of fate.

He was a handsome young man, with a contented mind, and visions of pleasure, luxury and ambition filled her thought by day and by night.

When the feast was ended, and all the guests had departed, the castle and the tower tolled out the twelve booming strokes of midnight.

Robert de Volpice asked for her hand in marriage. The mother consented, and the day was arranged for the wedding, which was celebrated in the chapel of the castle in the presence of the guests, groom's aristocratic friends.

A brilliant festival succeeded, to which all the village people were invited, and much they enjoyed the feast.

Snatched from the Grave.

Human Drift, and by J. Pickering Putnam, one of the most celebrated practical architects of Boston, that the success of a business experiment of this kind will revolve for and while.

Mr. Gillette believes that Niagara is the place to begin the construction of a city of this nature, utilizing the river and the falls, as Nicola Tesla has demonstrated can be done to supply power for the necessary machinery.

Mr. Gillette also thinks that the construction of one such building on Nineteenth street or anywhere else, would be approved, the almost entire rebuilding of the city into vast group buildings, with plenty of inter-space given over to market gardens and parks, could be left almost to the ministry of nature.
