TREAD LIKE A CAT. Excessive Care Exercised by Work

moves his shoe before entering a mosque is hardly more ceremonious than the every day workman in a gun-powder mill. For gun-powder has all the attributes of a Jealous and exacting delty, and unless it is treated with due deference it has a habit of puncturing solid stone walls with the bodies of its devotees and making itself highly uncomfortable in other ways. So when the workman reaches the mill in the morning he stops in a little vestibule and brushes his shoes and clothing with great care, removing every particle of sand and grit. Usually he wears long rubber boots that he may tread softly while in the august presence of the gun-powder. In some of the processes he dons a rubber cap and rubber mittens, and he is always exceedingly careful to He cannot receive any visitors at the works, for gun-powder has a partic ular aversion to strangers and not infrequently it disintegrates and scatters a new or pretentious workman over several acres of ground. Besides these peculiarities gua-powder has a distinct aversion to iron or steel in any form. No nails or bolts can be used anywhere in the interior of the building, and the machinery must all be of copper or gun-metal, held together with wooden pegs. Dirt of any kind, especially grit, is tabooed. About half the time of the workmen 's taken up every day in brushing down the walls of the mill and sweeping off the floors. A visitor would think to see them stealing around so softly and quietly with their brooms that the place was haunted, but it is only their way of showing respect to the gun-powder delty. The work is for the most part light and easy, the men receiving from $1.25 to $2 a day. They are necessarily of a high grade of intelligence, sober and Industrious. One heedless or blundering workman might cause horrifying loss of property and life. At a great manufactory near Keokuk, Iowa, the employes, consisting of about forty families, have organized a little commune. They have a club containing a fine library and billiard and pool tables and lounging-rooms. There is also a co-operative store in which each workman holds a share, and the company Plants in the east, and are ready at all guarantees the bills. It has been eminently successful. The discounts for cash on the merchandise bills are sayed and used to purchase new shares of stock, which are presented to the babies of the town in the order of their birth, thus furnishing a distinct encouragement to matrimony. While every precaution is taken against explosions the company always expects more or less of them, and the works are usually built in such a way that they will do as little harm as possible. Yet a prominent dealer says that fewer men are killed every year by all the powder mills in the country than meet their tleath under the wheels of railway trains in Chi-

Patriotism in the Home. 'Every household," says a woman, "should own a flag, just as much as it should have bed linen," a sentiment that will find few dissenters. The flag should not only be owned, but put out on every occasion on which there is the least excuse. Patriotism is inborn, to be sure, but lots of inborn sentiments need development and fostering. Love of country is one of the things that we cannot bring out too early or have too strongly demonstrated.

Beneficial. Carrying weights upon the head graduated to the strength of the bearer, tends to straighten the spine and improve the condition of the chest. This form of exercise, taken for say half an hour a day, will do much good to young people who are becoming stooped and round-shouldered. The exercise should be commenced at an early age, and the weight must be very light to commence with. It should at first, indeed, be more an exercise of balaucing.

Champlonship.

In all the out-door sports of the season the weather is playing champion to kneek out and close up games. A change will come, of course, and with hot weather will come the flereer struggle to make up for lost time. At this means a greater amount of wear and bones. What the damage in all will be from sprains, bruises, wounds, burts, inflamma-tions, contusions and the like, no one can tell, but there is a championship to be won, important to all, to which few give sufficient consideration, and that is the triumph over all these pains and mishaps in the surest promptest way. St. Jacobs Oil is the cham-pion remedy for all such ailments; it does not disappoint and never postpones a cure for any cause whatever.

Dreams and Apparitions and Strange

Antipathles-Haunted Houses and

Story of a Struggle in a Tomb. THE literature of the supernatural, writes William Abbott, in the New Orleans Picayune, is extensive and interesting, but our limits forbid anything more than a brief summary of the more interesting of its incidents. Roughly speaking, they are divisible into four classes-apparitions and haunted loealities, dreams giving warning of danger or death, disturbances among the dead themselves, and remarkable dreams and supernatural occurrences. Of the first class it is doubtful if a more remarkable instance could be found than the well-authenticated one which furnished Bulwer-Lytton with the materials for his story, "The Haunters and the Haunted." The detaits were vouched for at the time by two well-known English clergymen. The house stands (or stood) in Berkeley square, London. In a bedroom, the night before a wedding was to take place, a housemaid was continuing late preparations for the bride's reception next day. Just as midnight struck, the sleeping household was roused by piercing shricks, and the woman was found lying at the foot of the bed in strong convulsions. Her eyes were fixed on one corner of the room, and she was in an agony of terror. The others could see absolutely nothing unusual. She was taken to St. George's Hospital, where she died next day. The expected bridegroom, who arrived that day, declared his total disbelief in "ghosts," and insisted on sleeping alone in that room to see what would come of it. Despite all remonstrances, he did so, and with exactly the same result. The most awesome part of the story is that, in-credible as it would be but for the lestimony of witnesses, both victims refused to say a word in description of what they had seen. Each declared the sight was too horrible to even mention. The house was never again

A more recent example, combining oth the haunted house and the apparition, is that of the premises known at Hotwells, near Bristol, England. The premises were eventually destroyed to make room for other buildings, as the original and all succeeding tenants left in dismay. The supernatural noises were heard by all concerned on each occasion, and were like the outcries of several persons being murdered. The supernatural appearance was that of a huge black dog, which ran furiously out of the house, ridden by a monster of unknown kind, but resembling an ape. So late as 1869, a generation after the building had been destoyed, the apclass of appearances, the historic case the one who should first die would appear to the other, and declare what religion was approved by God. Miss Hamilton became Ludy Beresford, tled by the appearance of Lord Tyrone at her bedside. He told her of his death two days before, and that, being permitted to keep his agreement with her, he now affirmed the truth of revealed religion. He then foretold several important things which would happen to her, and being asked for a sign of his supernatural character, that on awakening in the morning she might not think it all a dream, touched her left wrist with his hand. The muscles at once shrunk and withered, and during the rest of her life she wore a black ribbon to hide the sear. The various predictions made were afterward fulfilled to the letter, and she died on her fortyseventh birthday, after summoning friends, to whom she related the whole tale. Scott's poem of the "Eve of St. John" is founded on this very story, which is part of the history of and Beresford.

the two noble Irish families of Tyrone

The third class, of disturbances among the dead themselves, would seem to stretch human relief beyond the breaking point, yet there are two well authenticated instances related of such. One is of the middle of the eighteen century. A strong antipathy existed between the wife of an English land owner in Lincolnshire and her brother-in-law. After her death he came to live with his brother, the squire, but died within a year. His antipathy to the dead woman broke out in his last moments, and he warned the clergyman in attendance that if he were buried in the same vault as she had been "the living as well as the dead should hear of it.' (The horrified auditor did not reveal this warning until two days atter this.) The burial was in the family vault. That very night a fearful sound, as co enemies struggling for the mastery in combat, accompanied by piercing shricks, was heard from the vault by persons living near by. The story was carried to the squire, who ordered the vault opened, when a most shocking scene was presented to view. The coffin of the lady and that of her daughter, who died the year before, were lying in a far corner of the vault, the young girl's across that of her mother, and close by was that of the brother-in-law. It had originally been placed upon the block stands usually so employed, but now it stood erect, though its weight had required six men to carry it into the vault before. The coffins were restored to their former positions and the door again securely fastened and a watchman posted outside. That night, and every night, the same fearful disturbance occurred, nor was it stopped until a brick wall had been built to effeetually separate the third coffin from the other two. Of the fourth and last class, the most remarkable is the story of Lady Anne Grimstone, wife of Sir Samuel Grimstone, of Garhambury, Hertfordshire, England. As her tombstone records, she died November 22, 1137. She was, strangely for a woman, an atheist, and reassirmed her principles while dying, adding: "If there is a God, and I find it so, seven ash trees shall grow out of my tomb." As any visitor to the churchyard of Tewin, in | if they will come to me I can certainly satisfy the diocese of St. Albans, may see for himself, seven ash trees have sprung up, interlacing the iron railing round the tomb and disjointing the stone

"THE DETROIT PLAN."

The philanthropic movement inaugurated in Detroit last year, whereby the unemployed and deserving poor were given means of support by being allowed to raise regetables on vacant city lots-the seed, the harrowing and plowing being supplied without cost to the poor—has passed the stage of experiment and is now deemed to be practleable in every particular, says the St.

Louis Post-Dispatch. The enterprise commends itself for the reason that it gives work to the unemployed without the stigma of pauperism; because it enables the destitute to do something for themselves and thus largely relieve the strain upon public generosity; because it gives land owners a chance to help the deserving poor substantially without incurring any outlay in cash; and because it teaches the poor of the great cities that there is health and self-help in cultivating the soil, and eventually will turn back to the country that fide of population which has for thirty years been tending away from farms and towards the cities. The success of the Detroit plan is largely due to the energy and public spirit of Capt. Cornelius Gardener, of the Nineteenth Infantry, United States Army, now stationed at Fort Wayne, Inside the city limits of Detroit. His large experience with army gardens and in the handling of men led Mayor Pingree to appoint him chairman of the committee having the philanthropic movement in charge, and he carried it to a successful issue, in spite of a severe drought and other discouragements. In response to a request from the Sunday Post-Dispatch Capt. Gardener has written a letter detailing his experiences with the Detroit plan, and making suggestion respecting its adoption in St. Louis. Meanwhile Mayor Walbridge has given audience to a number of citizens desirous of establishing the plan here, and the Mayor has not only approved of it but has offered the use of two vacant city lots owned by him to help along the good

It is a movement that should appeal strongly to all who are philanthropically inclined. It has the great merit that it bestows charity without lowering the self-respect of those who benefit by it. It is the most reasonable and most practical application of the doctrine of self-help. It blesses him that gives and him that receives, and it will surely find advocates and supporters in St. Louis who will make it a success here as it has been in Detroit and as it promises to be in New York.

In these storms it is impossible to tell direction or distance. One is simply lost when only a short distance from camp.

In the morning we walked down into town. One man went ahead breaking the snow, which came nearly to his armpits, as he moved through it. He would tread until tired, when he would drop to the rear, and some one else would lead the procession. As we walked into the valley it grew less, and down below in the town there had been no snow, and all the time the sun or the stars had shone. Such a snow goes like the dew-disappears, evap-

Sir Francis Head.

Another Quarterly Reviewer of the early days was Sir Francis Head, and well do I remember his cheery face and kindly manner. The last time I saw him he was hobbling about on a pair of crutches, for he had recently been suffering from a severe attack of shingles. His feats of horseman ship across the pampas of South America, as well as with the Quorn and the Pytchley, are matters of history.

On this occasion he said to me: "For fifty-two years I never missed one day getting on horseback until this malady attacked me, and I attribute my won derful good health to this constant practice." In order to obtain exercise while thus crippled he set up a swing in his garden on Duppas Hill, and was swung by his old coachman. "It is the next best thing to going across coun try," he said, "and I can smell the sea when the wind comes direct from the South Downs." I believed he had his tombstone al ready, prepared after his own design several years before his death, and used to keep it in his coach house un til it should be required, in the pretty churchyard of Sanderstead, near Croydon.-John Murray, in Good Words.

"My baby was a living skeleton. The doctors said he was dying of Marasmus, Indigestion, etc. The various foods I tried seemed to keep him alive, but did not strengthen or fatten him. At thirteen months old he weigl ed exactly what he did at birth-seven pounds. I began using "Scott's Emulsion," sometimes putting a few drops in his bottle, then again feeding it with a speon; then again by the absorption method of rubbing it into his body. The effect was marvelous. Baby began to stouten and fatten, and became a beautiful dimpled boy, a wonder to all. Scorr's Emulsion supplied the one thing needful.

Scott's Emulsion

is especially useful for sickly, delicate children when their other food fails to nourish them. It supplies in a concentrated, easily digestible form, just the nourishment they need to build them up and give them health and strength. It is Cod-liver Oil made palatable and easy to assimilate, combined with the Hypophosphites, both of which are most remarkable nutrients.
