130,000 LOST CHILDREN.

Restored to Their Parents by the Bellman of Liverpool, Francis George, the Liverpool beli man, is to retire from the service of the city, after a public career extending over a period of sixty years. He was ordinarily a member of the old dock police force. It is said that at one time the office of bellman was worth to the person who held it about £500 per annum. In addition to making public proclamations, it was part of the bellman's duty on all civie occasions to walk before the Mayor of Liverpool with a portion of the regalia. It was Mr. George's distinction in that capacity during his long period of office to walk before fifty-three Mayors. In these later days the office of bellman has be come practically a sinecure. The du lies which he had to discharge have become obsolete, and other means of announcement have superseded that of the beliman. Up to the present, however, to the bellman's house in Greek street are taken lost and strayed children who may be found wandering about uncared for in the streets of Liverpool. During his long tenure of office, Mr. George has received from police officers at the bellman's house the custody of no fewer than 130,000 stray children, whom he restored to their parents. Latterly this was the old bellman's chief emolument, each parent paying 6d. for the recovery of the lost children, and £25 a year was granted to Mr. George from the corporation.

Worthy Heroines. Do not confound the modern woman with the woman of the modern novel. There seems to be an increasing tendency on the part of the present day novelists to portray women who have a "past," as if the reader's or the spectator's interest could only be held by such a theme. If the heroine of the typical modern story is not a woman of this sort, she is too frequently drawn as an unnatural and impossible creature who is a travesty on the modern society woman. On the whole, the modern woman is a very well-balanced, healthful individual, who thinks sensi bly and lives sanely, and who, when she does unusual things, does them not to call attention to herself, but in the interest of some good cause for which she is working. The heroines of Walter Scott, of Jane Austen and George Eliot are sometimes called "old-fashloned" because they live their lives for the most part in obscurity and know only a simple round of duty and pleasure. But, after all, they are a far better type of actual womanhood than the modern novel's heroine; for they have the essential characteristics of womanliness-modesty, kindness and common sense. The difference is only the superficial one of opportunity and environment. The woman of intelligence and noble character interests us in real life. Let us have more portraits of her in our tales and our plays, that the generations to come may judge rightly of nineteenth-century womanhood.

Must Reckon with Gladstone Again. Mr. Gladstone may pretty certainly be reckoned upon as an active political force in what remains of the present session, and probably in the general said to have expressed his conviction that the real feeling of the country is in favor of the policy of the present Cabinet, and he is not likely to lose any opportunity of making it favorable. If, a year ago, his health had been what it is now, he would certainly be at this moment Prime Minister of England. In one form or another, the Unionist party may make up their minds to the fact that they will have to reckon with him in the House of Commons, and at the polling booths.-London World.

The Vinega: Habit Hard to Cure. "One of the most difficult habits to cure is that of drinking vinegar," said Dr. L. C. Aiken, at the Emery. "A good many women drink vinegar for the complexion, and in some cases it creates a craving for it even more insatiate than that for liquor. As the habit grows the victim is no longer contented with ordinary vinegar, but demands it stronger until they drink acetic acid with very little dilution. It burns out the stomach within a very few years, and it is seldom that a vinegar fiend lives even until middle age. It can b detected by the peculiar pallor of the countenance, but no antidote has ever been discovered by which the habit can be cured."-Cincinnati Enquirer.

Two Thousand Barrels of Flour Consumed Every Week-How Ma-

101,000 barrels per annum, and signifles the baking of 56,000 loaves of bread per day, 392,030 loaves per week, 1,736,000 per month and the enormous total of 20,410,000 loaves

The employes of this establishment, with the exception of a few who kneed and bake the rye bread output, are included in the great army of night workers, who toil while the average citizen is resting from the labors of the day. To partially supply the million of people who do not make their own bread, but who depend on the baker for the staff of life, over three hundred people are employed in

The first relay of workmen makes its appearance at 3 o'clock in the morning. These are the men who set the sponge for the following night's work. At 5.30 the men who work exclusively on rye bread come on duty and remain until six in the afternoon. These two gangs constitute the entire day force. To these men is delegated the duty of getting everything in readiness for a large force of bakers, who make their appearance at 6 p. m., when the real work of the establishment may be said to begin. The flour, which will soon come from the ovens in various shapes, has been sifted in the storerooms overhead. Following this, it passes through the several aerating machines and is sent below, through several great chutes, which lead to various sections of the bake shop floor in the basement. Here it is again put in barrels, where it is left to settle and cool until it reaches the proper condition to be run through the mixing machines. The sponge, which has been set during the day, is distributed in long, deep wooden troughs, situated in localities convenient to the work benches. Its transfer to and from the mixers is one of the most interesting details of the entire bread making process. Every thrifty housewife knows the consistency of bread sponge, but can, with difficulty, realeral stalwart men and a large cart to carry the sponge of one baking from the trough to the machines. This cart contains possibly five hun Ired pounds of solid, unwieldy bread dough, which is dumped into a revolving cylinder. the interior of which has been treated precisely as the housewife treats her shining pans when about to bake a batch of bread. When the sponge is once in the mixer, the various ingredients, including milk, water and salt, are exactly and carefully added, and the mass is allowed to stand for a few moments, when it is ready for the flour. Again would the average housewife be astonished at the manner in which the flour is added to the

No scoop, dipper, pan nor pail would answer the requirements of this gigantic sponge. Strong men pick up an open barrel and toss the entire contents into the mixer. Barrel after barrel follows in quick succession, until nearly 1200 pounds have been thus distributed. The machine is started and thus begins the first step in the kneading process. As the cylinder slowly revolves, the kneading being assisted by iron arms which revolve inside the chamber in opposite direct tions. So that the mixing may be more thoroughly and quickly done, the head baker stands by to stop the machine. As soon as the dough has reached a consistency in which it can be taken out in great masses of from eighty to 100 pounds, it is again leaded into the cart and taken back to the troughs to raise.

A very interesting feature is the actual kneading of the various shaped loaves, their transfer to the ovens in a raw state, and their exit therefrom, brown, plump and giving out a pun-

When the dough has "raised" sufficiently the busy time in bread making is at hand. At each work bench is stationed a man who weighs the dough which makes up each loaf. The scales are unerring and the loaves consequently never vary in size. Each kind of bread has a separate scale, and a separate crowd of bakers, who have become so proficient that where eight or ten are working at one bench it is impossible to distinguish one loaf from another, either before or after leaving the oven. The dough having reached oven proof the hand kneading and rolling process begins. Practiced hands beat it and roll it, playing what may be likened unto a drum chorus, as they rapidly prepare it for the oven. Much of the bread is baked in pans, yet there are several of the popular shaped and higher priced varieties which are baked on the oven bottom. manufacture of bread. The sweepings which accumulate on the store house floor and in the bakeshop are sold to iron molders, who utilize them in dusting in the process of casting. Paste makers are also ready purchasers of this refuse, and no inconsiderable portion is disposed of to farmers who feed it to their hogs. Mummies Make Good Onion Manure. In view of the fact that Egypt was once the center of civilization and learning, whence science radiated to every corner of the globe, vestiges of Egyptian lore being found even in this hemisphere, it is somewhat painful to think that the only item which the land of the Pharaohs now contributes to the world is onions, which are being shipped in huge quantities to the United States. And to make matters worse, we are informed that the popular "baeli," as the Egyptian onion is called, owes its fine flavor as well as its size to the fact that the fields in which it is grown are fertilized with the powdered mummies of the sages who flourished on the banks of the Nile 3,000 and 4,000 years ago.-New York Tribune.

The disease did not trouble me much at first, but it seemed to have settled in my body to stay and my bitter experience during the last thirteen years proved that to be the case.
