

him, with various views, two or three years." Now weigh this well. Paine was as much a devil then as when he died. The defendant knew him for no other than Tom Paine, the author of that very Age of Reason which holy inspiration now calls upon him to arraign.—Yes he was the first to wait upon him and to welcome him; to take a lodging for him, and to continue his intimacy with him with various views, two or three years. "My intercourse (says this historian) was more frequent with him than agreeable; but what I suffered in feelings from his want of good manners, his dogmatism, the tyranny of his opinions, his peevishness, his intolerance, and in his new-born virtues did two years ago. And at this hour she is perhaps to learn those opinions, so foreign are such topics to her guiltless nature and her feminine spirit. Nay, more; she did not even speak Paine's language, nor he hers—This you may gather from the evidence, and from the history, which is now evidence. Paine never could speak French though he could read it; she never spoke English till she learned it here; and Mr. Underhill, the defendant's witness, has confirmed this, because in mimicry he tells you, that after years of residence she spoke imperfectly, and called her child Paine's child.

Would this man believe, even on an atheist's faith, though he affirmed with uplifted hands, or on the faith of the most "pious and intelligent nurse" that kites and doves would bill and beck together? If he is not credulous enough for this and more than this, he does not, nor did he when he wrote it, believe the horrible slander. No, gentlemen; but truth was not his wish. He wanted filthy anecdotes to swell his scandalous chronicle, and make his history a precious merchandise for all the idle and illiberal, who take delight in wonders and in wickedness.

But it is said that all this must be excused, because he is a labourer in the vineyard, a christian hero, and historian.—Whence fell this sudden dispensation upon him? or who ordained him to uphold that faith which no man in this country except his atheist friends and he himself had questioned? or if it was in danger and likely to succumb, could it receive from the attacks of twenty such as Paine so great an injury as from one single advocate like him, who lives by writing down all christian charities?—Are there not venerable men enough, who spend their youths in studying, and their maturer years in teaching christianity; and do they want the aid of common libellers? Are there not those, the chosen of their flock, whose pure and innocent lives give efficacy to their words? good fathers, faithful friends, and tender husbands, who practise what they preach; whose gentle manners and mild intercourse inspire your souls with reverence and love? whom you can hear with confidence and follow with delight? who in your sickness visit you, in your afflictions comfort you, with whom you and your families can join in modest prayer before the altar of eternal mercy, in the blessed hope of everlasting life? with whom invoke his power, who by whatever name he may be called, through whatever medium the ering eye of weak mortality may view his image, is ever God? But shall such ruffian accents trouble the peace of heaven and of man? He has! and never could the foe of woman's peace be friend to God or man.
