

him, with various views, two or three years." Now weigh this well. Paine was as much a devil then as when he died. The defendant knew him for no other than Tom Paine, the author of that very Age of Reason which holy inspiration now calls upon him to arraign. — Yes he was the first to wait upon him and to welcome him; to take a lodging for him, and to continue his intimacy with him with various views, two or three years. "My intercourse (says this historian) was more frequent with him than agreeable; but what I suffered in feelings from his want of good manners, his dogmatism, the tyranny of his opinions, his peevishness, his intemperance, and the low company he kept, was perhaps compensated by acquiring a knowledge of the man. The latter part of his life was spent in the city of New York under my own eye; but I have made particular enquiries of the persons in whose houses he successively lived, as to his manner of living, his temper, and his habits. The facts respecting his death and burial I have from a humane and sensible quaker gentleman; from doctor Manly, his kind and attentive physician, and from his nurse, a woman of intelligence and piety." Well said! humanity and piety! Most humane doctor! most pious nurse! benevolent and chaste historian, that haunts the living to revile the dead; that keeps his ravenous eye upon his prey, and follows him just as the shark does the distempred vessel, to feed upon the carcase; that leagues with honest doctors and pious nurses, whose babbling gossip he vouches for the truth of his most christian history; doctors and pious nurses who betray the wretched secrets of human frailty and dissolving nature, to this evangelical historian, who gloats with pleasure at the odorous details, and gives them to the world as the generous dedications of apostolic zeal, that labours in the vineyard of faith to save poor sinners souls! Oh, vile hypocrisy! oh, gross imposture! And will you, honourable citizens, be pulled by this? Will you believe it possible that this man has no malice? — To my imagination his own story presents the image of some nasty vermin, that engenders in the morbid parts of some decaying body; and the creature of corruption; the precursor of life's dissolution; who, like a worm or a maggot, begins but where life ends, and batters in the bowels of disease.

Gentlemen, — I do not speak at random. — This history is now in evidence, and every line of it is now before you. I never read it, but my eye has caught some passages, that warrant me to say, the author was malicious and unfair, and that he neither could nor did believe the truth of what he wrote, nor in the honesty of those from whom he got it. No; but he went about like those who buy old rags and broken glass, and sought for nothing sound, or whole or cleanly — For instance, he went to the house of Mr. Hitts, (I have marked the page down for your inspection) and Mr. Hitts being too honourable to hold such vile communication, or furnish this libeller of the living and the dead with any malicious calumny against the man his roof had once protected, or violate the faith of hospitality, he sets him forth in history as a concealer of all heavenly truths, and travels round to gather scandalous gossip from angry enemies, from disappointed claimants, soured expectants, from adverse litigants, from pious nurses and chagrined doctors, whose bills and charges were disputed, and then returns with his dirty budget, not like the bee that sucks sweet honey from the fragrant flowers, but like a wasp, whose only industry is in his sting, or like a serpent, who leaves the wholesome food that nature spreads to feed his venomous maw on what is rank.

He knew Tom Paine to be the author of the Age of Reason, yet in his book he states himself to be the very man who took upon himself the friendly and familiar office, on his return from France, to take a lodging for him. In the very preface of his history you may read this: He sat at table with him, whilst he ate beef steaks, drank beer, and looked so ugly; thus he continued his acquaintance with him "with various views." — He was his eulogist and commensurator, that is notorious. And on this trial he seems to have no friends to vouch for him but all the worst of Paine's. What could his counsel mean, who opened with this proverb, Tell me your company, and I'll tell you who you are. You see how truth will pierce through brazen walls. In his history he gives some of Paine's writings which the public eye had never seen before.

I never saw Tom Paine but twice or thrice. The first time was in Paris, when he seemed to me the type of fallen manhood, a melancholy ruin. His habits then, not suiting well with mine, I left him to himself. I had no "various views." I never commemorated him living, nor libelled him when dead. I never was his host, his guest, nor tavern companion. I take his picture, therefore, from his historian, and I ask, could we believe, that such as he describes him, a wallowing, withered, filthy being, uncleanlier than the swine, the filthiest thing that ever walked erect; all, petulant, and ill natured; caroused and cupped, a drunkard, a sulkard, and a miser; a hater of the sex, who did not consummate his lawful marriage — I ask in the name of heaven and truth, if this were so (and if it be not so the historian lies) could we believe that such a one as that ever seduced a woman? Did he believe that such a piece of flesh, and, at a time when he was wretched, procribrated and penniless, lodged by the generous controversies; that such a one could be the gay and fortunate seducer of a lady, bred up in Paris, in the pride of life, of polished habits and personal attractions, and have seduced her from the father of her children, a man of personal figure, manners and shining acquisitions? One of his counsel has argued, as if he thought his client's cause would be the safer the more it was entrenched in heaps of calumny, that if she did not love his person she did worse, she loved his principles. Gentlemen, this lady has no more to do with his opinions than you have to do with those of Mr. Cheetham. She neither hated him nor even Mr. Cheetham, as those who love his new-born virtues did two years ago. And at this hour she is perhaps to learn those opinions, so foreign are such topics to her guttless nature and her feminine spirit. Nay, more; she did not even speak Paine's language, nor he hers. — This you may gather from the evidence, and from the history, which is now evidence. Paine never could speak French though he could read it; she never spoke English till she learned it here; and Mr. Underhill, the defendant's witness, has confirmed this, because in mimicry he tells you, that after years of residence she spoke imperfectly, and called her child Paine's child.

Would this man believe, even on an atheist's faith, though he affirmed with uplifted hands, or on the faith of the most "pious and intelligent nurse" that kites and doves would bill and beck together? If he is not credulous enough for this and more than this, he does not, nor did he when he wrote it, believe the horrible slander. No, gentlemen; but truth was not his wish. He wanted filthy anecdotes to swell his scandalous chronicles, and make his history a precious merchandise for all the idle and illiberal, who take delight in wonders and in wickedness.

But it is said that all this must be excused, because he is a labourer in the vineyard, a christian hero, and historian. — Whence fell this sudden dispensation upon him? or who ordained him to uphold that faith which no man in this country except his atheist friends and he himself had questioned? or if it was in danger and likely to succumb, could it receive from the attacks of twenty such as Paine so great an injury as from one single advocate like him, who lives by writing down all christian charities? — Are there not venerable men enough, who spend their youths in studying, and their maturer years in teaching christianity; and do they want the aid of common libellers? Are there not those, the chosen of their flock, whose pure and innocent lives give efficacy to their words? good fathers, faithful friends, and tender husbands, who practise what they preach; whose gentle manners and mild intercourse inspire your souls with reverence and love? whom you can hear with confidence and follow with delight? who in your sickness visit you, in your afflictions comfort you? with whom you and your families can join in modest prayer before the altar of eternal mercy, in the blessed hope of everlasting life? with whom invoke his power, who by whatever name he may be called, through whatever medium the ering eye of weak mortality may view his image, is ever God? But shall such ruffian accents trouble the peace of heaven and of man? He has! and never could the foe of woman's peace be friend to God or man.
