

any particular method of effecting these objects. He did indeed suggest, that freeholders, householders, and others, subject to direct taxations in church and state, should have a right to vote: and, as to the endurance of parliaments, that it should be brought back to the legal period. His hon. friend certainly did take property as the basis of political power. It was to property that they looked in the days of Henry VI. when the amount, at which an independent freeholder was to be estimated, was fixed at 40s. If they were at this day to endeavour to ascertain the same thing, who, he would ask, were more likely to be independent than those who were able to pay the heavy burthens now imposed on the people of this country? He had no hesitation in declaring the feeling of his mind to be, that the right of election should be regulated by the property of the country, and should belong to those who contributed to the exigencies of the state. Who were they that now represented the freeholders of 40s. a year? They were comprised exactly in that class of men to whom he had alluded; namely, those who pay all the taxes of the state; and who by paying the whole taxes, are now the most independent body of men in the kingdom. The right hon. gentleman (Bourne) had said, that the constituent body had greatly increased. Why should it not do so, in proportion to the increase of property? It was a doctrine which he ever should maintain, that the people could not be taxed unless they were represented—Henry VIII. when he imposed taxes upon Wales, gave the people of that country representatives—thus laying down and marking this distinct line of right—As to the duration of parliaments, the hon. mover preferred triennial. By an act of Edward III. parliaments were ordered to be holden every year, and ofner if necessary. This rule was strictly observed from the 18th Richard II. and was first infringed in the reign of Charles I. when for twelve years together there were no parliaments at all. After this time triennial parliaments were first introduced, and came, at the time of the revolution, to be considered as the law of the land, although, in the Bill of Rights, frequent parliaments are the words made use of. The idea of triennial parliaments was a sentiment held sacred till the reign of George I. in the year 1716, when, instead of three years, parliament itself passed a law, declaring that it should live for seven years. It might be argued that the supreme legislature cannot be bound. But if the representatives of the people took upon themselves to destroy the power of the people, he should venture to assert, that a more illegal act could not be committed; and that if ever high treason was committed against the state, it was in that very act. He begged leave to read to the house the sentiments of my lord Raymond on this occasion:—"The king, lords, and commons can no more prolong a parliament beyond its natural duration, than they can make a parliament." Again, alluding to the despotic ministers of those days—(a laugh) the right hon. gentleman opposite (Perceval) might judge how far the words were applicable to the present times.—He said, a standing army and a standing parliament are fit instruments to support each other." The right honourable gentleman would know how far this applied to himself and to the present ministers—(Cries of hear, hear, question, question!)—He asked what passed last session?—Was it not then admitted that taxation and representation should go hand in hand? That was all he asked. The advantages to be derived from this rule, he could not pretend to calculate; but when he heard the right honourable gentleman (Bourne) contend that, when that house imposed taxes on the public, they also taxed themselves, he could not forbear from thinking that the sums distributed from the public revenue among the members of that house might account for some of the votes passed by them.—If all the people who paid taxes were entitled to the right of voting, he entertained no doubt that there would be an end to corruption, as it would be impossible that bribes could be given to so vast a number of electors. How then could a seat in that house be wrapp'd for a writership? (alluding to the case of lord Castlereagh)—Such a thing would be impracticable—it would be impossible. (Cries of hear, hear! and question, question!)—As gentlemen seemed to be in such a hurry for the question, he should not trespass much longer on their attention, though, to his mind, the subject was of far greater importance than they seemed to suppose. There was another reason, why he was anxious to see a more extended exercise of the right of franchise. It would do away the number of controverted election petitions, which so much time was occupied. Between the reigns of Henry III. and Edward IV. being a space of 200 years, there were only three petitions of the kind presented to the house. The question being again called for, the hon. gentleman sat down.

(Intended for next Saturday's Scourge.)
To "A Married Man."
Such is the signature you have assumed in a slanderous article which appeared in last Saturday's "Scourge;" I will not enquire, for it is not necessary, whether you are double or single—but, if you have a partner, you seem very much disposed to distrust her, from the malignant jealousy and calumny which compose your leading question to me. You ask me, to answer, whether I did not lately call at a gentleman's house to serve a summons or subpoena, and finding him absent, basely and villainously attempted to seduce the wife of his bosom, and offered her ten dollars for a compensation for the prostitution of her marriage vow?
Had I done so, it was your duty to affirm it like a man, without resorting to the cowardly practice of asking impertinent questions—but I will not avail myself of any advantage from your skulking; I unequivocally answer your question in the negative—As your other questions depend on this, they must share its fate. Why should an honest man be afraid or ashamed to walk the streets? It is perhaps not owing to modesty, but to fear, that anonymous scriblers conceal themselves.
JOSHUA ARMSTRONG.

LAND FOR SALE.
The subscriber has a PLANTATION lying on the Patuxent Falls, about four miles from Reister's Town, eight from Westminster, one from Hooker's mill, and twenty-one from Baltimore. This land extends to, and fronts the Turnpike road a considerable distance—there are some beautiful lots well adapted for either store or tavern. This tract contains 150 acres, more or less; there is near 30 acres of meadow fronting the house, some of which is in timothy and some of it is yet to clear; there is a fine ditch of water which extends a considerable way through the meadow, and runs within two rods of the house, which is very convenient; also an excellent spring not far from the house, and many others too tedious to mention. The improvements are a Log Dwelling House 38 feet long and 16 feet wide, divided into two rooms and a fire place in each; also a Log Barn and some other small buildings; an excellent Garden 90 feet square, a young Apple Orchard of 160 trees, some grafted with different kinds of fruit. This tract lies beautiful to the sun and produces well, and is a very healthy place, as much so I believe, as any in Baltimore county; and a plenty of wood land on it. Whoever is disposed to purchase will apply to the subscriber.
