his emply vanity, grasp for those distinctions which were ordained to reward he-reic achievements—that he should threaten the minister of the day with the de fation of his nominees in that house unless he obtained that ribband, which though an ornament to merit, must, when otherwise conferred, be considered a badge of disgrace to the wearer. Has such a case nevce happened, c. was it impossible that it should ever happen sgain? Had it never occurred that me naces of a similar nature were made to a minister, unless his countenance was giren to some proposed public work, in which was, however, blended some lit private interest, but for the accomplishment of which the public money was to be entirely applied? If, then, such things have happened-if they can tappen again-who was it that could deny it to be a most profligate exercise of those powers which were entrusted for far different purposes? Between the contending opinions of his hon. friend and that of the right hon, gentleman (Mr Bourne) opposite, he (Mr W.) was placed in a dreadful alternative -His hon friend said, that unless reform took place, a military despotism would follow. The right honourable gentleman was fully persuaded, that if reform was acceded, this country, after being drag ged through the vortex of democracy, would at leng h be subjected to a military government. It was not for him to say that either consequence would follow; but in adjuring that house to ac quiesce in the motion for going into a committee, he would appeal to the authorities of the dead to strengthen the admonitons of the living. I call upon you to bear in ren embrance the mighty characters who have expressed their de ended support of this question of reform. The horrors of that democracy which the cental of reform had accelerated in France, have subsided from their own exhaustion. England, though buffetted in the tempest, has escaped from the general wreck which has befallen so many other nations. Will she not profit even by their example? Will she, with their columnies and their fate speaking to her with more than oracular · force, refuse to redress, and, by such in fatuation, hurry to the same destiny? more. Events have taken place within these walls which have sunk deep into the hearts of the people. It is time, that many of the gentlemen opposite think the impression done away, and that the popular reason is now righted. If the right honourable gentleman opposite (Mr. Perceval), the first minister of this country, thinks himself justified by the decisions of this house, he must allow me to tell him, that he grossly deceives himself Let me assure him, that the votes of this house, which were meant to justify his actions, have in no inconsiderable degree increased the advocates for parisamentary reform. Those cars, which springing from the changes of Europe in 1792, had so slarmed the mind against innovation, now cease to All men see the absolute necessity of reforming—they see that dan-iger pressing upon them which was so feared and to expected when our expenditure was ten millions. When after wards twenty millions. How much more chilling the prospect when it has been increased to seventy millions! and when we contemplate the awful truth, that all human resources are finite! There was little to add to the reasoning already ad vanced at various periods upon the subject But with respect to the sale of seals, he would contend that the man returned by his money could have little cornexion with the public feeling. With constituents he could never come in contact, perhaps never see them. He therefore had no bias to comply with their opinions. He felt and acted as the representative of his 5000l. When versed in the system of ministerial management, he would not remain long back ward in pursuing that course which he observed followed by so many to their own private advantage. Mr. Whitbread next adverted to the Septennial Act, which, abstractedly considered, he thou most tyrannical, but which was in some incified by the motive which le to its adoption at the time, namely, the preservation of the house of Brunswick on the throne of these realms. He would vote for triennial parliaments, and for regulating the manner of taking votes. The latter would be a consequence of the first, and without it the other would be miolerable. Whether under a reform the members returned would be intrinsically better than those who now sat there, he would not say; but by coming under so many popular checks as much good would be produced as if they were intrinsically better. After expressing his wish to see, though not the efficient officers of the crown, yet their dependents removed from that house, he concluded with observing, that even though no other good was to follow but the satisfiction of the people, for that the exertion

plishment the most salutary benefits would follow. (To be concluded )

NEWYORK, July 9.

On Sunday the 17th of June, the Spanish brig Bolador Pedro Paillet master on a voyage from the river Gambia to Pensacola, with slaves, put into Nassau N. P for water and provisions having been 52 days ont.

By this vessel we have the pleasure to learn, that hopes are revived of Munge Park's being yet alive. An African had arrived at Senegal from the interior, with intelligence that this colebrated trave'ier was then in the Bambara Na. tion, a close prisoner; this account was so far credited as to induce Major Max-1 well, the commandent, to fit out a vessel at Goree (the schr George, Credit master) to take the African informant up the Gambie, with promises of due reward, should he be able to bring back a letter or other token from the prisoner, to establish the fact. The schooner had returned before the Bolador, sailed, af. ter having landed the African a considerable distance up the river.

There was a report at Goree that an expedition from England, supposed to be destined against the Isle of France had touched at Madeira.
