3. Impressment of scamen. To be entirely abandoned, America agreeing to exclude from her navigation seamen not ci izens of the U. States, on the principle contained in the instructions of the 20th May, 1867, to Messrs. Munroe and Pinkney, which, on account of the rupture of the negotiations, were not, in that respect, acted upon.
4. Colonial trade. The right to the direct trade, viz. that carried directly from the colonies to the belligerents in Europe, to be waved by the U. States: provided that the trade between the U. States and the colonies, and that in colonial articles between the U. States and other countries was formally recognized, according to the principles contained in the same instructions.

5. Commercial relations. The partial nen importation act of the U. States and the convoy and other extra duties of G. Britain to be repealed: and generally every source of collision arising from that species of commercial warfare to cease by a mutual repeal of all discriminating duties, in conformity with the instructions to Merers. Munroe and Pickney before mentioned. The two nations to place each other, in every other respect, on a footing of the most favoured

On this last point, my observations were general and equally applying to both countries. The systems of restrictions which those of Great Bittain had forced the U. States to adopt being equal-ly injurtous to both. And Mr Erskine is mistaken in supposing that I would have preferred at first, measures of a more decided nature to the embargo

Mr. Erskine appears, so far as can be inferred from the correspondence now published to have supposed that in order to induce his government to take inconsideration these propositions, and to adopt a conduct consistent with just principles and with the great and permanent interest of G. Britain, it was absolutely necessary to dissipate the prejudices they had imbibed: And his efforts seem accordingly to have been principally used in trying to convince them of the sincere disposition of the members of the American administration to adjust the differences between the two countries. Knowing the earnestness of his endeavours in promoting that object, the difficuties he had to encounter in his attempts to in duce the British ministry to take a comprehensive and correct view of the subject, and the sanguine temper which he discovered throughout the whole trans action, I feel no disposition to cavil at the general coloring of the language ascribed either to other members of administration or to myself. But there is part of the despatch in which I cannot for a moment acquiesce.

From usual expressions imperfectly understood, and incorrectly stated, and from what he calls "my manner and slight insinuations," Mr. Erskine infers that I thought that the president (Mr. Jefferson) had acted with partiality to-wards France and that I had attempted to contrast Mr. Madison's sentiments in that respect with those of the presi-

That Mr. Erskine's object was to use the change of presidency as an argument to induce the British ministry to elter their measures towards America; and that the opinions thus ascribed to me were his own, is sufficiently obvious from the whole tenor of his despatch. But the inference as it relates to me is totally erroneous: and Mr. Erskine must have mistaken my assent to the existence of surmises of partiality in Mr. Jefferson towards Prance for an acquiescence in the truth of them.

I might with truth have spoken of Mr. Madison, not as feeling a particular admiration for the British constitution and institutions, but as having net-ther bias nor entity towards France or England. But I never could or did contrast his sentiments in that respect, or escribe to bim opinions on the subject of our foreign relations at variance with those of Mr. Jefferson.

I knew those surmises respecting Mr. Jefferson to be altogether destit foundation -To have, in the most inditect marner, suggested or countenanced a belief in them would have been direct faisehood. So far from having, even by my silence, acquiesced in inst-nuations of that nature; when Mr. Erskire, once, and once only dropt a hint to that effect intimating a supposed hostility to England, and that the president had not placed her conduct in a fair light before the public, I immediately repelled the charge, and, amongst other ob servations, reminded him that the only time when the British government had, by the proposed equalization of duties, made an approach of a liberal and conciliatory nature towards America, it was immediately met by the president who had expressly recommended the subject to congress in his message; and that the plan had been defeated by the clamor of that party in America, which was consi dered the best disposed towards Great Britain. That, on that occasion, a change took place in my manner is very probable; but Mr. Eiskine has ascribed it to source very different from that which occasioned it. I had very lately been ealonsly employed in repelling the harge which I never could hear without ndignation. Eight years of the most inmate intercourse, during which not an et, nor hardly a thought respecting the freign relations of America was con laled, enable me confidently to say, at Mr. Jefferson never had in that reect any other object in view but the prection of the rights of the U. States

sively to France, so long as her decrees tagainst every foreign aggression of inju-violating the neutral rights of the United ry from whatever nation it preceded, States continued in force. wards all the belligerents the most strict justice and the most scrupulous impar-His character stands not in need of this declaration: it is due to myself:

The groundless accusations of foreign bias and influence have generated solely by the virulence of party spirit ; and they were adopted abroad as an apology or pretence for unprovoked aggressions. A just sense of the injuries received and the most temporate efforts to obtain redress constitute what has been called partiality. And it seems to have been for gotten that, from the time when Mr Jef ferson became President till the month of August, 1807, no actual aggressions on the neutral rigits of America had been committed by France; whilst, during the same period, the nominal bl ades of enemies ports by England and the annual actual blockades, as they may be called, of our own; the renewal, contrary to express and mutual explanations of the depredations on the indirect colonial trade the continued impressments of our scamen and the attack on the Chesa-peak had actually taken place. During that period, the laws, the executive acts, the negotiations of the American government could have been directed to that government alone, from which injuries had been received. But from the time when the rights of the U States were invaded by both belligerents, every public measure has equally embraced both; the like efforts, founded on the same basis, have uniformly though without success, been made to obtain redress from both : And the correspondence now pub. lished furnishes at least irrefragable proof of the earnest desire of Mr Jefferson's administration to adjust the differences with G Britain, and of their disposition to remove, for that purpose, whatever might serve as the shadow of a pretence for a dental of justice on her part.

ALBERT GALLALIN. Washington. 21st April, 1810.

DEAN SWIFT:

AN EXTRACT. In the year 1724, swift's patriotism burst forth with great vehemence, in his opposing the currency of Wood's half pence. A full levee was held at the castle in Dublin, the day following that on which a proclamation had been issued against the Draper. The Lord Lieutenant was going round the circle, when Dean Swift abruptly entered the cham. ber, and, pushing through the croud, never stopped till he arrived within the cir-With marks of the highest indignation in his countenance, and in a voice which echoed through the room, he addressed the Lord Lieutenant as follow : " So, my Lord Lieutenant, this is a glo rious exploit that you performed yester. day, in issuing a proclamation against a poor shopkeeper, whose only crime is an honest endeavor to save his country from ruin. You have given a noble specimen of what this devoted nation has to expect from your government. I suppose you think that a statue of copper will be erected to you for the service thus rendered to Wood." He then for some time continued to inveigh in the bitterest terms against the patent, and displayed in the strongest co ours the fatal consequences of introducing that execuable coin. The whole assembly were struck dumb with wonder at this unprecedented scene. In the presence of this man of virtue, the titied slaves and vassais of power felt and shrunk into their own insignificancy. Swift stood supereminent among them, like his own Gulliver, amidst a circle of Liliputions. For some time s profound silence ensued; but at length, Lord Cartetet, who had instened with great composure to the whole speech, regard, in the following quotation from Virgil:

Res dure, et regnt novitas, me talia cogunt

Hard fortune, and the newness of my reign, compel me to such measures.

The beauty of this quotation restored good humour to the whole assembly, and the leves broke up, some highly extol ling the magnanimity of Swift, and all admiring the ingenuity of the lord lieutenant's answer.

No 7, South GAY-STREET.

THE Subscriber respectfully informs the Public, that having completed his spparates upon a very extensive scale for making difficial Mineral Waters, he is now prepared to supply them with SELTZER, BALLSTON, and SODA WATERS, in the highest possible perfection.

It is with confidence he new colicits the support and patronage of the public, assuring them that every exertion shall be made to give satisfaction, and to render the establishment worthy of their encouragement.

These waters, it is well known, have been strongly recommended in various complaints and with the greates advantage by the most eminent of the faculty, both in Europe and America. The invalid, tormented by Dispensis, or any of its distessing symptoms, is sure to find relicf in this salutary beverage; and the Bon Firant, whose oppressed stomach is wid by libations of Madeira, &c. over night, is effectually cured by a glass of Soda in the morning. that in every case the proposed remedies should answer:

SELTZER WATER, from its pleasant tast and medical virtues, has been long in very general use. It has been very new ecommonate by physicians for its antisepita powers, consequently for its utility in many commonned by physicians for its antisepted powers, consequently for its utility in many of the febrile and other diseases of large towns. It is a powerful antiscorfutic. In bilious complaints it is particularly useful, by correcting the acr mony of that build, and assisting the tone of the stomach and bowels, by which pain and irritation are obviously on sisting the tone of the stomach and howels, by which pain and irritation are obviared or removed. In nervous affections it is useful by invigorating the general system, exaling the spirits, and removing weakness. To the fill effects whether nervous or bilious, which take place, as the debilitating consequence of hard living, it is peculiarly adapted. It is most refie-hing and salutary after excess in eating and d inking, by allaying the feverish next and this st generally arising thereform.
