SELECTED. AN ISIAGE OF LIFE.

The following from a late number of Dr: Aiken's celebrated publication, the Athenanum, is by the English poetess. The idea of Miss Matilda Bethem, the piece is a very novel one]

WERE writing lives to be my task I'rom cottages to kings, A little book I'd only ask, And fill it full of wings.

Each pair should represent a day; On some the sun should rise; While others bent their mournful way Through cold and cloudy skies.

And here I would the lightning bring, To dark its forky glare, And there the hallow'd rainbow fling Across the troubled air.

Some faint and heavily should glide, Their broken flight along, While some high in the air should ride, Dilated, bold and strong.

Some, rgitated, and adrift, Against their, will should rove; Some steering forward sure and swift, Should scarcely seem to move.

Others the happiest of their kind, Should in the ether soar: As if no care should ever find, No sorrow reach them more.

When soon an arrow from below Should wound them in their flight; And many a crimson drop should flow, Ere yet they came in sight.

Their rapid and abrupt descent, Their stain'd and ruffled plume; Appears as they were pever meant Their station to resume.

But soon their beauty and their force Sweet hours of rest renew ; Again their bright and varied course With ardor they pursue.

And thus alternate rise and fall Through each succeeding day; For this of any life is all I should aspire to tay.
