

Duke has the front of his leg cut, a wound in his arm, one on his forehead, and another on the cheek, supposed to have been done by the razor, after he had closed with the assassin. He has also one of his little fingers nearly cut off. It was some time, as the villain cut at him with such quickness, before he could extricate himself from the bed. A sergeant's guard immediately came to the door, which was opened quickly by the porter, and the guards rushed up stairs. There they found the Duke faint with loss of blood, which was streaming from his wounds. After having conveyed him to his bed, they went in search of the assassin, having taken care to prevent all possibility of his escape. They searched the Duke's chamber and the closets without effect. But it seems as soon as he heard the Duke open the window and call for assistance, he retired to a water closet and cut his throat with a razor in such a manner as nearly to sever his head from his body. He was quite dead.

BALLAD—By Peter Pindar.
 Why flyest thou away with fear?
 Trust me, there's nought of danger near;
 I have no wicked hook,
 All covered with a snaring bait,
 Alas! to snare thee to thy fate,
 And drag thee from the brook.
 O harmless tenant of the flood,
 I do not wish to spill thy blood.
 For nature unto thee
 Perchance hath given a tender wife,
 And children dear, to charm thy life,
 As she hath done for me.
 Enjoy thy stream, O harmless fish!
 And when an angler for his dish,
 Through gluttony's vile sin,
 Attempts, a wretch, to pull thee out,
 God give thee strength, O gentle trout,
 To pull the tascal in.
