

well as the paper of the rooms, the prints and paintings. The door at the head of the bed, (through which his royal highness attempted to make his escape) was cut with the sword, at the time the wretch was cutting at the duke. The dark assassin must have followed his royal highness to the door of an anti room, which was also spotted with blood.

Ann Neale, the housekeeper, said, she was called about three o'clock, on Thursday morning, by her husband; at the same time she heard the duke saying, "I am murdered." She got up with all possible speed, and saw the duke bleeding very much in the valet's room. She went, with several others, to the door of the deceased, to call him. She found it fastened on the inside; and no answer was given to their call. She and other servants went to another door which opened to his room. As they approached the door, they heard a noise as if a man was gargling water in his throat. The porter entered first, and exclaimed, "Good God! Mr. Sellis has cut his throat." He was a very obstinate and quarrelsome man. He would not bear contradiction, not even from the duke. His royal highness and the princess Augusta stood (by proxy) to his last child. The duke was very partial to him, and allowed his family to sleep in the house. His royal highness allowed him to ride in his carriage with him, when traveling, since his illness. The princess Elizabeth gave his wife two pieces of muslin lately. The princess Augusta made her a present of several articles of value. The principal acquaintance the deceased had was Mr. Greenville, a servant to the duke of Cambridge, and Mr. and Mrs. Dupree, wax chandler. About three weeks since he told her, Mrs. Marsh, the housekeeper to the Royal Cockpit, was dead, and that he should speak to the duke to give the piece to his wife; and if he did not succeed with lord Dartmouth for that, he should apply to him to get his wife a situation, as he had asked his royal highness to get him a messenger's place, but he supposed the duke did not like to part with him. She asked him, about a week since, if he had succeeded? and he replied he had not yet. He and his family were in so much favour, that every court day, when the queen came to dress at the duke's apartments, for the drawing room, Sellis' wife and children were called down, for the queen and princesses to see them. On the last drawing-room day, the child the princess stood for, was brought into the queen's private apartments. A special privilege was allowed to Sellis, of a bell being permitted to be put up, to ring him to the duke from his family's apartments. The deceased would quarrel with people sooner than give up a point.

Matthew Henry Grashen, a servant of the duke, said, he armed himself with pistols upon his being called up. He was not able to find his way to Sellis's apartments by the regular door, but found his way by another. He and his two fellow-servants were afraid to enter the room, on account of the groans and noise in the throat of the deceased, although he had two pistols, and another had a sword. He had been so much frightened ever since, that he had not been able to visit the room where the body lay. He considered Sellis a civil, well behaved man. He had heard him call Neale a thief, and say he could prove him such. He never quarrelled with the deceased. He seldom heard Neale and Sellis speak together; did not suppose he ever heard them exchange ten words together. The last time the duke went to Windsor, he took Sellis inside the coach, because he would not expose him to the morning air. He never observed Sellis to be low spirited; he did not appear so well lately as in general, in consequence of his having a cold.

John Probert and John Windsor, two privates in the Guards, said, they were on duty, opposite the duke's house, at the time of the alarm, and were positive no person went out of the house after the alarm was given. The widow of the deceased was examined. Her appearance and evidence excited the greatest compassion and interest; it tended to prove he was a good husband, not embarrassed in his circumstances, and that he had parted from her in his usual way, without any suspicion of what he had in contemplation. The evidence was not got through till half past ten o'clock, and the jury deliberated for upwards of an hour, and then returned a verdict of Murder de se.

NEW-YORK, July 22.

The ship Oliver Ellsworth, captain Hall, 50 days from Gottenburg, arrived here on Saturday evening;—passenger Mr. Nathaniel W. Strong, who informs that admiral Samarez, in the Victory of 28 guns, with the Mars of 74, was blockading Gottenburg; and the different ports in the Baltic, but had not captured any American vessels. American vessels & property were respected in the Swedish ports; no interruption by the British of American vessels bound to Russia; & several had safely arrived at the port of Riga;—and, the Danes had not recently issued any new decrees against our commerce. No new sequestrations of our property at Tonnin had taken place. Markets at Gottenburg, in consequence of the blockade (to use a mercantile term) were rather flat. About 20 sail of English vessels, under American colours, laden with colonial produce, &c. were at Gottenburg, with forged papers.
