

It is pleasing to observe that something of the same spirit has recently been gradually, though slowly, progressing to the South and West. The legislature of Maryland have lately manifested a just discernment of the true interest of that important state. The city of Baltimore is making efforts worthy of her rapid increase in wealth and population. The advantages accruing to the farmers in the country, from the turnpike roads which she is extending in various directions towards the North and West are daily dissipating the prejudices which had been imbibed by clownish ignorance, and were fostered by sordid insularity. Experience is teaching them that what they had dreaded as bringing ruin to their property, has not only rendered the transportation of their produce to that great and growing emporium of commerce much more easy and less extensive than formerly, but has contributed greatly to the value of their lands.

She too hath put in her claim to participate in the trade of the West—and her claim will be heard. The resources, the liberality, the enterprise of her citizens will ensure its validity. Nor is there any reasonable ground of jealousy between the ports in the district and Baltimore. Her interests, as far as they relate to the Western country are intimately connected with theirs. Indeed the greater part of the Western trade, of all the waters of the Chesapeake, if not ultimately of the Delaware also must concentrate at Cambridge, the Potomac. From there it must proceed by the same routes in its progress to the waters of the West. From the point westward, the opening and improving of the public high-ways will result from the united efforts of the whole aided by the powerful co-operation of the Western states. What principally remains to be effected by the citizens of the district, and the people resident on the Potomac and its waters in order to enjoy great share of this valuable trade is to complete the navigation of their own river, and to cultivate among themselves the most perfect harmony and co-operation in all their commercial speculations; especially in those directed to the West. The towns in the district must act as a whole not as detached parts having separate views for their great and all important interests are the same. They should cling together and mutually aid and support each other. Union will give energy and effect to all their operations. For this purpose every avenue of intercourse with each other should be rendered as easy and as complete as possible, that they may be able to communicate with facility and expedition, and draw from each other, when requisite, those supplies that may be necessary for their several customers.

The adjacent states still continue their parental regard. They have not yet withdrawn their fostering hand. They had, heretofore, incorporated a company with extensive powers, to improve the navigation of the Upper Potomac and its branches—they had subscribed and contributed largely to the stock of that company—and during the last winter, the Legislature of Maryland with a truly laudable liberality, have authorized the raising of 300,000 dollars, by lottery, to be expended, under the direction of that institution, in more completely effecting the objects of their association. Still it remains with the people themselves, to determine whether they will profit by a boon so bountifully bestowed. If lotteries, which it must be acknowledged have become too common, are in any case admissible, it must be to effect an object so important. It cannot therefore but be confidently hoped, that the good people, whose estates are to be increased in value by the expenditure of so large a fund, and whose produce is to be borne to market on the Potomac and its branches, the Monocacy, the Shenandoah, the Conococheague, the South Branch and their numerous tributary streams will manifest a knowledge of their own interest, a liberality and a public spirit, not inferior to those manifested by their brethren of Pennsylvania, New York and the Eastern States.

VIATOR.

NEW YORK, October 5.

DIED, at Naples, on the 19th June, in the 70th year of his age, the Rt. Rev. LUKE CONCANNON. This venerable prelate had been appointed about two years ago, and consecrated Bishop of New York, by the present Sovereign Pontiff. Pius the 7th. No sooner was he appointed than he tried all means in his power to repair to his beloved flock, but the unhappy circumstances of war and revolutions always prevented him from attaining the object of his most ardent desires, till at length he had reason to believe, after a series of disappointments, that the long wished for period had arrived, which would enable him to obtain a passage to this country. Naples in Italy, was the port from which he contemplated sailing, whither he repaired, in order to avail himself of the opportunity of a vessel there, bound for the United States. He had already secured his passage, when the government of Naples informed of his arrival and intention, arrested, declared him a prisoner, and ordered him under the severest penalties not to embark in any vessel. This disappointment is thought to have affected him so severely, on seeing himself probably debarred from ever being able to come to the remainder of his days to the bosom of his flock, that he fell dangerously ill, and in a few days terminated his exempt and edifying life in the great convent of S. Dominick, in the above mentioned city, where on the following day his obsequies were celebrated. Dr.

Concannon was the of New York, upper the Apostolical S. This desire of be at the age of near resolution of com ter having resided court of Rome, agent for the B England, to both had rendered the tant services.
