

...recommending myself to her good graces. I once had some thoughts of soliciting her patronage, on the score of resembling great men in their qualities; but I had so little to say on that subject, that I could not, for my life, furnish matter for one well rounded period; and you know a short, ill turned speech is very improper to be used in an essay to a female deity."

From the Salem Register.

A just, unvaried, and unyielding policy alone, can give to America vigour with extension—virtue with wealth—and greatness with refinement. An unwearied and stubborn watchfulness over our rights, is the only way to preserve them. An unrelenting and energetic retaliation of our wrongs can alone command present respect, or secure us from future injury. When during the tempest of anarchy and the hurricane of war, the bright orb of American honour and American courage broke through the blackened clouds, gave splendour to the storm, and cast its resplendent beams from its common centre, our blood-stained plains to every portion of the globe, the heroes of those days could never have anticipated its declination, or suspected its eclipse. But some have lived to see that honour tarnished, that courage made to bend. Some have remained to behold their former exertions practically slighted, their noble achievement suffered to decay, and their early spirit to be lost in the gulph of avarice and fear.

The submission of our American congress to injustice and insult, is an unwelcome theme—but it might not be forgotten. It should be displayed in its true colours to public view, that the indignation of an injured people may save their country from being again engulfed in its dark bosom; and teach their future rulers, than in the nation there is energy to support its rights. To flee from just details of our country's situation, when praise is scarce and truth reproach; to shrink from a disclosure of national evils, or dread an investigation of national prospects, unless it can be banded under the imposing names of prosperity and power, marks the feeble spirit, and displays the coward. To paint his native country in all the splendour of success; to give her in bombastic effusion the influence of omnipotence, and in one short paragraph raise her to unbounded fame and eternal glory, is every where the vacuous employment of the self styled hero and imagined patriot. His disordered imagination forms a lively picture, which he applies to any object his momentary feelings may dictate; and in his paroxysms of patriotism, he makes his country the hero of every tale his maddened brain creates. Such may be sincere, but they never can be serviceable; they may be zealous, but they never can be operative citizens, or good members of society. Solid happiness must be built on reason—substantial glory be the effect of justice. In our own country, we may in succeeding times, see this maxim receive a glorious illustration.

The power of the United States can never be founded upon the scattered remains of neighboring kingdoms, nor permanently established by the consequence of momentary victory, or by the fame of successive conquests. Her fame must be built on another basis, her glory arise from another cause. Europe can boast her warriors, who have spread wide desolation over the cultured fields of enemies. America may hereafter rejoice in a just, a peaceable, yet wider conquest over the unfurrowed territories of barbarism and ignorance. France may exult in the renewed submission of Europe to the iron crown of Charlemagne.—America in future years, may with prouder emotions point, as trophies of victory over the obstacles of nature, to an extended interior navigation to her rising manufactures; and to the waters of the Missouri and Mississippi, burdened with the produce of the rich soil of Louisiana, become subject to American arts and American laws. Napoleon may sacrifice the cities of the eastern continent to the explosion of the secret mine, or the ingenious art of the hostile engineer—while those of the western may become the seats of opulence, the deposits of the fruits of agricultural industry, and of the products of manufacturing enterprise; the resort of the arts, and treasures of science and refinement.

But these national blessings may be withered in the bud, destroyed in the growth, or felled in maturity by intermediate measures or neglect. Where honor is extinct, laudable ambition can never thrive. The mind that has once lost its sensibility to right or injury, becomes a barren wild, where nothing can flourish but the greatest propensities and the meanest passions. When the feeling sense of wounded sovereignty is lost to an injured nation, all emulation must cease—all hopes of future greatness die. A people, whose ideas of honour are contaminated; who once become intimate with tolerated insult, and sacrifice their rights to the cravings of insatiate avarice, to offer their victims to disgraceful fear, will find their apathy and cowardice prove the Uras of science, prosperity and freedom. It is by a just conception of their natural rights, an undaunted determination never to suffer an injury to pass without reparation or revenge; and by a persevering resistance to every principle incompatible with national sovereignty, that the character and honor of any people must be maintained. By the energy or weakness of government, this spirit will be supported or destroyed. If its acts become the practical approval of these sentiments; if vigour and perseverance be the foundation of its policy; and if, instead of partial evils, the general good be the goal to which the exertion of every power be directed, the same zeal will accuate every citizen—nor will the storms of adversity and war have any effect but to aggrandize and extend the flame of patriotism. But if, on the contrary, difficulties should depress its courage, and danger banish its resolution—if one right should be abandoned for the sake of peace, another for temporary gain—if the injury of yesterday be forgotten, because the more glaring insult of today attracts more notice—if eternal principles be abandoned to violation, without any other resistance than wordy remonstrance, and freedom be left to protect itself—the noxious effluvia of baseness, cowardice and servility will pervade the body politic—corrupt every noble feeling—enervate every heart—and haste the zera of the eternal night of slavery.

The recognition of the rights of the United States by one of the belligerents, forms an important epoch in American politics. France acknowledges the privileges of neutrals, and vows her determination no longer to infringe them.—This is a period, from which we may hope to date the adoption of an efficacious and forcible policy by the American government. Our attention is now directed to the cabinet of Great Britain. Not the mere theoretical abrogation of her orders in council will induce the American people to hold out to this den of pirates the hand of fellowship. The total abandonment of the buccaneering principles upon which they are founded, and an ample reparation for her repeated assaults upon our country's sovereignty, must be its necessary appendages. Let then the members of the American government arouse from their disgraceful lethargy—let them attempt to resume the spirit of their fathers, to re establish the character, and regain the honour of their country; let them join with the spirit of the butchered Pease in requiring the punishment of his murderer;—let the remembrance of the carnage and robbery, to which the bloody decks of the Chenestake bore witness, louden their calls for satisfaction; let the emancipation of the thousands of the impressed Americans and the entire abolition of such infernal robberies be demanded—and let immediate war be the consequence of refusal.
