neutral rights practised by England; and formally pledged himself to the world, that this decree should be considered as the fundamental law of his empire, until England should acknowledge that the rights of war are the same on land as at sea. Never before was the pride of man more strongly pledged to persevere in the course prescribed to himself. By what potent charm has the iron heart of Napsleon been softened? What has induced this mighty conqueror to stop short and alter his premeditated course -Something more powerful than all the armies he ever yet opposed—something to him more fearful than all the instruments of terror and destruc ion that he ever yet me! in his destined course of victory. It was the God of Acture and of justice, speaking to him from the hearts of his oppressed subjects in the unutterable anguish of their injured social feelings-from his pliant allies, in doleful remonstrance, that threatened gathering dangers to his fortune and to his fame; and above all, from the firm and intelligent ministers of America, the only representatives of the rights of the perceful and independent world in distracted Europe. It is this which has appalled the stout heart of the boasted son of Mers and of fortune; that has in duced him to stop short in his bold career; to retrace his steps; and to yield to his haughty and more persevering competitor the prize of victory in the race of infamy
It is pertinent to enquire in this place

From what causes does England adhere to her system of hostility against our neutral rights, with so much more pertinacity than her antagonist? This question is partly answered by the view we have taken of the maritume pride and spirit of domination that has become the ruling passion of both political parties in England; the usurped power of the crown, assuming to dictate by cabinet orders to the pensioners of its favours, its submissive agents in the prize courts -and the artful subserfuge of parlismentary sanction, to which, however illegal both ministers and judges may resert as a pledge of indemnity for all marriage transgressions, past, present and future at least as sacred and binding in their fayour, as that henour, which is but too well observed among thieves.

By the principles of the Roman, or civil law, recognized in this respect in their fullest extent in France, the will of the emperor is law. On him of course rests the greatest possible degree of responsibility — This responsibility was never shunned by Napoleon When pressed by the complaints of his subjects, the intimations of his allies, and the un-answerable remonstrances of America, neither his laws nor his power permitted him to point to his scape goat ministers. or pre absolved judges, as the causes or cure of the evil. Whatever odium attended his measures, he knew he mu-t bear it upon his own shoulders in the face of the world. Its weight became too heavy for even him to sustain, and he flung from him the irksome load with the best grace imaginable.

Far otherwise in England. There, all directly or indirectly share the plun der of the despoiled rights of neutral; but none are responsible in practi al effect, whatever may be the nature or extent of their offences against other na-

By the constitution of England the king can do no wrong, and is of course absolved from all personal responsibility. Look to his ministers, who we once considered as answerable for his measures. however ill-advised, and they are secure in infamy by a perpetual act of indemni-Go to your last resort for legal redress, those venerable sanciuries where Justice, impartial and inflexible, once sat personified in the judges of courts of maritime jurisdiction, throughout the British realm, and you are insulted with the mock-show of automata, placed upon the bench, (avowedly as defiation of the lords commissioners of admiralty.) and moved at will by the arch jugglets behind the curtain at the cabinet council of If one of these prefec ured St. James and pre absolved deputies receive, as he generally does in course, his master's orders in council as the RULE to govern his conscience, he is indemnified by act of parliament. If his conscience is not sufficiently mollified by royal bounty to conform in all cases to royal instructions, common law comes in for his protection. He is presumed to have acted with honest intentions, and is not to be impeached for an error in ju igment.

Thus has the British notion, once so celebrated for its justice and its love of freedom, deliberately, by its representa-tives in parliament, broken down one of its strongest barriers against tyranny and injustice, presented by its boasted constitution, and opened the door to unlimited depredation at the will of the cabinet, while it has excluded all personal responsibility, so far as other nations are concerned, both in the executive and judicial departments.

We find then on examination that the king of England however circumscribed in his authority where his own subjects are concerned, is vested with as uncontrouled power for every purpose of wielding his immense navy and annoying the rights of neutral commerce, as the most despotic tyrant that ever reigned With this unlimited power, there never existed the man so deaf to the voice of justice, so callous to a sense of safety and of shame, as to have borne up under the edium of its flagrant abuses, du ring the last eighteen years of the reign of the present king of England, had he stood, like the emperor of France, before his nation and the world, upon his with Ton Many Cooks.
own personal responsibility. The keep-principles of the minor outrages against ers of the honour and the person of good easy George the 3d, have nothing more to do to preserve appearances of what is lost, and to retain what remains for their own private use, than to play off the mi-scrable remnant of their nominal sovereign in such a manner as to amuse the credulity, pamper the avarice, and gratify the unsocial pride of the English pation

The success of an appeal to the honor of this king has been tried by our government. The experiment has shown how little we have to expect from the rectitude of this shattered piece of moonsmitten majesty. His ministers had some use for his ravings, but none for his reason, and they knew how to tune his intellect to their discordant purpsses with America.

With this view of the organization and disposition of the British cabinet and courts of admiralty, it is but too manifest that if ever we gain a voluntary and amicable recognition of our rights by that nation, it must be by a popular ap peal to its misguided honesty, urged by the united intelligence and patriotism of

Let us then avail ourselves of the common channel of intercourse from mind to mind between the two nations. Let the language which we speak, so far as we are concerned, be devoted to its dar-ling native themes Let it preserve its characteristic discrimination of moral ex cellence and turpitude, and lose nothing of its stern severity in the cause of liber ty, law and universal justice. If the press have been degraded to the convenient vehicle of wilful and pernicious popular delusion on these important subjects where a correct popular understanding is so essential to the permanent interest and honour of freemen; let it make stonement for the vile abuse, and bear to England these substantial maxims and saintary admonitions, which are worthy the high pretensions of the boast ed defenders of the liberty of the world.
THE VOLUNTEER.

* Napoleon, though he suffers directly by our submission to the abuse of British impressment, fias never bean hardy enough to hazard his reputation upon the retalistion of this first and most enormous ffence that blackens the history of the presentage.
