The latest Paris papers we have received are dated the 8th, but some of the 9th, we under tend have reached town -It is said they contain a demi-fficial article dated from the frontiers of Spain, and giving an account of the events in the peninsula. Massena, it is said, was seen in every part of the line in the late action, as well as all the other marshals; they encouraged the advance of the men. Janot and Mortier headed some of the co lumns as they marched towards the ridge, where our troops were waiting for them. They had artillery, but few of their pieces could be brought to bear, owing to the difficulty and acclivity of the ground in Busaco, and a few that were, were but indifferently served. Ours, on the contrary, planted on the ridge, did much execution. The enemy, unable to profit by their numerous caval ry or aftillery, telted entirely upon numbers, aided by their discipline and steadiness, which were conspicuous in the order and firmness with which they ascended the ridge; no opposition was made to them till they get near the top of the ridge; they were then charged, and driven back with immense slough ter. Only one of the enemy's divisions reached the op of the ridge, and that was soon dispossessed of it by the 88th, the 45th British, and the 8th Portuguese regiments.
