

they do not follow themselves the wise measures they wish to inculcate on us; they are frequently at war, and destroy one another. We find there is no perfection in man, whatever he be his colour. The French and English nations, with whom we have formerly been connected, we understand are now at war with each other. Our connection with those nations are now dissolved, and we have no other interest in their wars, than what man ought to feel in the destinies of man. In the struggles of these nations, we understand our American brethren have received injuries; and that these injuries may possibly produce war. Under an event of this kind, (which possibly may take place) we have seriously considered what line of conduct will be most proper for us to pursue. The representatives of all the nations, now in council, on this subject are united. They have agreed to follow the advice of their Great Father of the seventeen fires—to take no part in quarrels in which we have no interest, nor to waste our blood in fighting the battles of others, which can produce no good to ourselves; but to remain quietly at our villages, and attend to our agriculture, hunting &c. for the sustenance and comfort of our women and children.

Brothers,
This is the determination of the general council of the nations we represent, it becomes the duty of every individual to attend to it, and we hope and expect it will be attended to, as we consider it to be a measure on which our safety, happiness and prosperity depend.

We call on the old chiefs to impress this advice on the minds of the young warriors, and we call on the young warriors to listen to the counsel of their old chiefs, and afford all their aid in carrying into effect the determination of the council of their nations.

The foregoing is a copy of a speech signed at Brownstown, 29th Sept. 1810, by the chiefs and head men of thirteen different nations of Indians, in my presence.

(Attest) WILLIAM HULL.

To the Prophet and our younger brethren the Shawanese.

BROTHERS,
The old nation from whom you descended salute you in friendship.

When we hear of the difficulties among any of our Brethren, we leave to yourselves; we only wish you to make such regulations as will be for your good. Whenever your measures have an influence on the other nations it is their duty to speak in the plain language of truth and sincerity; in that language we now shall address you—

Brothers,
Why have you separated from your elder brethren of the old nations? Why have you forsaken their ancient customs and manners? Why have you disregarded your good old Chiefs, and committed the management of your affairs to inexperienced young men? Why have you invited the young men of the old nations to your council, and influenced them to measures contrary to the customs of the nations to which they belong? Why have you not listened to the council of your great father of the seventeen fires? Why have you refused his justice and liberality, and in a manner which must justly have provoked his indignation? You ought to consider, and we all ought to consider the relation in which we stand to our white brethren. It is not necessary to look back further than the treaty of Greenville—we then buried the hatchet, and it has remained buried to the present time. If we regard our own happiness, and the happiness of our descendants, we never shall again take it up. We live in the same country, and have occasion to travel the same roads, both by land and water. The same Great Spirit protects us, and is pleased when we are friends, and angry when enemies.

If we have any habits injurious to us, let us forsake them; if your example or advice have been useful in any respect, we thank you; whatever improvements we see among our white brethren let us adopt them; above all things, let us live in peace and harmony among ourselves, and in friendship with our white brethren.

Brothers,
Open your ears and listen to what we lastly said to you. The great council fire for the different nations, has been for a long time, and will continue to be kindled at this place. Here your Chiefs will attend and will be listened to. It will be improper for you to kindle one at any other place, except for your nation alone. When you think it necessary to kindle one, for your own particular nation, at any other place, you must invite no other nations to attend. We are willing to forget what has passed, provided the same thing does not take place in future; we are willing to forget the distress, and calamity which has attended our people in their useless journeys to your village. We do not wish to count the number who died, or dwell on the distress of those who survived, and returned. But remember you are the youngest of our nations, and these things must not be repeated.

The foregoing is a copy of a speech signed at Brownstown, September 26, 1810, by the Chiefs and head men of thirteen different nations of Indians, in my presence.
