[From the New York Mercury.] AT REST.

BY C. AMORY BRUCE

It comes at last, the hour so long awaited, The hour by weary hope so long foretold; It finds the strength of passion unabated-It meets a love that ne'er grew faint nor cold. Forgotten is the dall and aching sadness, Forgotten all the painful, dreary past; I hear thy voice. I see thy glance of gladness, .
I press thee, darling, to my heart at last.

Come to this heart, O love! so long a stranger, Come to this heart that asks for nothing more; Too long apart upon a sea of danger It tossed and never saw the welcom shore. Now in hope's haven sheltered from the blast;

Our happy hearts, all doubt and danger scorning, Can say, "Thank Heaveu! our love is safe at last." I do not know if time has dimmed the splendor That early passion found within thine eye; I only know its influence, soft and tender, Charms as it charmed me in the day gone by. I can not tell what lands, what fates, await us,

If wealth or want upon our way be cast;

I only know if future bless or hate us,
