Grey morn, in meditation Rapt, stole o'er the town. High heaven and The rippled river talked, in conf'rence sad, For, from the cloudy bosom of the realms On bigh, the rain-drops fall, and, Whispering, mingled with the waves below.

So it bed been for years. Sunshine and shade, twin angels from The nurseries of the skies, had come, anon, And twined dead wreaths of wo, Amid the flowers of hope, about the Alters of the excient house. God's Chariot of had come, and bourne From out the halls its loved, and Yet its earthly. And many yet remained Whose memories, as they dwelled upon Those mystic calls, bowed down, and wept, And pressed more closely to their souls The prospect of a house, whose shrines Are never draped in gloom.

To memory, chastened by the pain-Strokes of the past, there often comes the Music of a hope, whose strains are only Marked "within the vail."

Across the threshold, had the steps of Youth and age been heard, for many years. Three generations there had loved, and wept And vanished, all; save one, and that was Plodding in the other's steps. And there to-day they stood, the gathered from Afar, to wait and sob, and part. There Rose the stalwert form, in manhood's might. There also drooped the locks of coming age, The father wise, the matron grave, young Womanhood in tender love, and chilhood too, All bowed, and silent, while the quivering lip, And tear-filled eye, told all too truly Of the spirit-spell of love that triumphed there. But of the group were two. Two brothers Side by side. For years they had not met; So wide the field of life's great gleaming. With scythe in hand had each his Solitary work pursued, and heard the ripe Shocks fall and gathered them alone, But they bad met, and now they were to part. Rough a anly hands were clasped, and Trembling tones fell melting in the scene, They told of days to come, of years, in which No meetings more might be; of how the Grave might claim them, e'er they could Embrace again. And then of Heaven, The meeting on Eternal shores, no more to Pa: t, and as the spirit wrote two pure Names in the Book of Life, the silence came again. I we become pressed each other for the Love they could not speak. Stout arms antwined two frames that trembled with The grief they could not husb, and Kindred tears fell, mingling sad, o'er two Bowed faces, where the furrows of the grave Were gathering fast. One deeper, wilder Pang fled o'er their hearts, the farewell breathed

And they were two again. Then others came to say Good-Bye, The tender kiss, the kind embrace, the Deep-drawn sigh, the sobbing group, the Echo of reluctant steps, and they were gone.

Slow through the parting tide Careers the massive craft, unconscious of The aching hearts upon her decks; and Heeding not that weary hands are waving, Toward the gazing family group upon the Distant lawn, a long and fond farewell, That tearful eyes are turning from the scene Of youth and home, now passing from their Sight, to weep away the leaden hours, till Life's wide harvest shall again present its Unbounded sheaves.

The distant smoke is curling O'er the deep. The river looks as but An hour ago, and Time moves on as Quickly and as calmly as of old, save That across his aged brow another line Is drawn, and from his musing eye a Tear-drop falls.
