In the transaction of his varried and frequently very burdensome duties, Medical Purveyor Cox was always accessible and obliging, and he retires with the best wishes of the Medical Department and of the business community. His efficiency was most conspicuous in periods of urgency, and the issues of supplies were never made with more celerity and precision than when the demands were most multitudinous and imperative. He transmits to his successor an office thoroughly organized and conducted upon a system creditable to his executive ability, so that no inconvenience will result from a transfer to other hands.
