la days of old on a fearule plain Atar in the boly land. Two cuies towered in loveliness --Like sisters did they stand.

Crowned with their marble roofs and spires And clad in fragrant flowers, Perpetual summer in them bloomed, And plenty filled their towers.

But woe unto the careless hearts That in those cities dwelt! They turned them from the one true God; And to false idols knelt.

With gems and tvory they bedecked Their gods of stone and brass, And deemed in reverly and feast Life like a dream should pass.

One faithful beart alone was found Throughout those cities fair, Who still adored the living God With sacrifice and prayer.

At dead of night, when on the plain The pall of darkness lay, God sent His angeldown to call That one true heart away.

He led him to the mountain-paths Far from the marble gate, Then left, upon the fertile plain, The cities to their fate.

Then did the heavens light up with flame, Then fire poured down like rain; O'er burning streets, 'mid crumbling walls, The dwellers fled in vain.

For earth had opened 'neath their feet, And when the flay did break, Where stood the cities on the plain Was now a dark, broad lake.

And still afar, in Palestine, That sullen lake doth lie, No fish can in its waters dwell, No bird can o'er it fly.

And ever it reminds how God, Lord of the Seraphim, Saved, in that desolation's hour, The one who hoped in Him.
