BT CIMON. Where are the flowers whose brilliant hues The eye enthralled the vision charmed? Did chilling frosts their beauty choose Or winter pass them by unharmed? The Ice-king placed his crom on them, Its weight the tender tendrils parted, The withered trunk, the leafless stem,

Remain to tell us they've departed.

Where are the joyous days of youth When fancy ruled us unrestrained? It clothed the wildest dreams with truth, Of future sorrows ne'er complained! The memory of those happy years,

The sighs from burdened breasts extorted, The facts of life, the hopes, the fears Repeat the requiem-all 'departed. Where are the hopes that raised the soul

Upward with found anticipations?

And seem in vain to seek the pole, The acme of its aspirations ? The Man, oppressed with care and grief Remembers he was once light-hearted, The night is long-the day was brief, And numbered now with things departed!

Where are the friends in prosperous days The hand of fellowship have taken? That flattered with soft words and praise, Now fortune has her toy forsaken! Adversity drove them away, Their victim left, when broken-hearted,

Those friends but of a summer's day, Like flowers, and hope, and youth departed. The flower, though nipped by winter's breath, Shall bloom again when spring returns,

So learn O, man! that nought but death Can quench the loving faith which burns ! Appealed to, thus that faith replies, "Strive for the goal for which you started, Let vain repinings, tears and sighs' Be numbered with the thoughts departed! Broad Creek Neck, March, 18th, 1865.
