From the Lady's Friend. WAITING.

BY MRS. M. F. TUCKER.

A sweet girl hung her head. Her cheek blushed rosy red. And with tremulous tone she said-(As she thought of her hero lover) "He will come to me, I know, Ere the summer roses blowi He will come in a month or so, When this cruel war is over.

"Soon, soon will the strife be past! The end is approaching fast; Bless God ! he will come at last, My brave, my beautiful Harry! The shadows fall on the grass, The night winds murmuring pass, Dear heart, alas! and alas! Alas! how our hopes miscarry!"

Afar in a narrow bed. With only a slab at his head, He is lying stalk and dead, With the cold damp earth for a cover And she-she will wait in vain! Though her tears fall down like rain, He never will come again, Her beautiful hero lover !

Medallion of Mrs. Wedgwood.

This medallion represents Mrs. Wedgwood in one of the fashionable head-dresses of her day. Her hair is dressed in the "maccoroni" style, but of much less dimensions, and more simply elegant, than was worn by most ladies of fashwork of wire, over which false hair was arrangevery gay color, leathers, flowers, and strings of dresses of the period when Mrs. Wedgwood's Jones experienced the truth of this remark. ing Rebels that secession would not be resisted; previous to that time, was a constant and fruitof the day, and many droll stories were told concerning them. One writer says, speaking of the enormous size of the heads of the ladies, "It is not very long since that part of their sweet bodies used to be bound so tight, and trimmed so amazingly snug, that they appeared like a pin's head on the top of a knitting needle; but they have now so far exceeded the golden mean in the contrary extreme, that our fine ladies remind me of an apple stuck on the point if a small stewer."
