So arise with the lark and doubt not his song Has shed her bright mantle of sun shine around; And away to the spot where work my be found.

Oh breath no more that simple air, Though soft its wild note swell, For it but beralds in despair Within my heart's deep cell; And, oh, in earlier, happier days, . In fashion's crowded throng, I've heard from lips as fair as thine,

That sweet and gentle song; But she, so beautiful, so young, One evening feel asleep, Was carried home to God-while I Was left alone-to weep.

That well-known strain has in my soul Renew'd the dreams of youth; When every scene was arrayed in The garb of faith and truth; And as I hear its melting note, I think of happier hours, When life was strewed with buds of hope, And fairy blooming flowers; Then all was bright and beautiful, But now these joys have fled; And she, who warbled that sweet song, Sleeps with the silent dead.

I ask thee, then, can I, unmoved,

List to that melting strain, Which brings the idol of my soul Back to my view again ? And oh, blame not my falling tears, As I list unto thee; For though she's sleeping in the grave, She's still the same to me, Then, oh breathe not that simple air, It fills my soul with grief, But let me in forgetfulness
