Best of All.

The world has very little it can give To make us happy; all its precious things-What men call precious-and for which they live; To a sad heart are worthless offerings; For what are the gems, and what is tawny gold And rarest spices from sweet Indian blooms! And silken fabrics, shimmering fold on fold, The costilest products of the Eastern looms? They cannot save the soul a single pain, Or to the weary heart bring hope again.

What is the flash of wit, the saloon's glow? The wine may flash, and lesp and sparkle up From marble tables, white as wintry snow, And brim blood-red the gold-incrusted cup; The air may languish, filled with perfumesweet, Etruscan vases burn with roses red, And velvet carpets, sinking 'neath the feet, Give back no scho from the stateliest tread. Splendor alone can never give us bliss.

Far more we prize a gentle touch, The mute caress of fingers on the hair; A low word spoken-oh! bow very much These little tokens do to lessen care; It matters little if our home be bare Of luxury, and what the world calls good, If we have only one spirit there By whom our better selves are understood, Whose deepest beart-throbs are for us alone, With whom in thoughts and wishes we are one.

The Old Barn.

No hay within its widespread mows, No horse within the stalls, No broad-horned oxen, sheep or cows, Within its time-worn walls.

The wind howls through its shattered doors, New swinging to and fro; And o'er its once frequented floors No footsteps come or go.

Oh! once alas! each vacant bay, And every space around, Was teeming with sweet scented hay, The harvest of the ground.

The well-fed cattle in a row, At manger ranged along, Each fasten by an oaken bow, Stood at the stanchions strong, But where so long old Dobbin stood,

His master's pride and care,

And from his hand received his food; All now is vacant there. Then these broad fields, from hill to plain, Wared in the summer air, With choicest crops of grass or grain,

Now left so bleak, and bare. How sweet the music of the flail, Resounding, far, and clear, As borne upon the passing gale,

It reached the distant ear. The black-bird hailed the dewy morn, From out his rushy perch, The sparrow sang upon the thorn, The cat bird on the birch.

The robbin from the highest tree Sent forth his whistle clear, His soul partaking of the glee, That wakes the vernal year.

And childhood's merry shout was heard, The farm-yard choir among, Which, mingled with the notes of bird, Enriched the tide of song.

The master on his daily round, With conscious pride would go, His faithful dog close by him found, Attending to and fro.

Old honest "Trip," long since has gone, And moulders 'neath the wall; No more he takes the welcome bone, Or hears his master's call.

The kindly master too has died, The matron in her grace, And dead, or scattered far and wide, The remnant of their race.

But peace, and blessings, on the past, The poet now would say; Our joy cannot forever last, Nor sorrow ever stay.
