BY ALICE CAREY. My father had a fair haired barvester : I gleaned behind him in the barley-land;

And there he put a red rose in my hand; O ormel, killing leaves those ross leaves were He sung to me a little lovelorn lay. Learned of some bird; and while his sickle swep Athwart the shining stalks, my wild heart kept Beating the tane up with him all the way.

One time he rested by a limped stream, O'er which the loose-tongued willows whispered Ab, blessed hour I so long and long ago, It cometh back upon me like a dream.

And there he told me, blushing soft-ob, me Of one that he could love—so young, so fair, Like mine the solor of her eyes and bair; O foolish heart! I thought that I was she!

Full flowed his manly beard; his eyes so brown Made sweet confusion with their tender look; I thousand times I kissed him in the brook, Across the flowers, with bashful eyelids down.

And even yet I cannot hear the stir

Of willows by a water but I stop, And down the warm waves all their length I drop My empty arms to find my harvester In all his speech there was no word to mend .

Whate'er he said, or right or wrong was best,

Until at last an ARROW pierced my breast,

Dipt with a fatal point—he called me FRIEND. Still next day my heart the fading rose I worn, But all so sad; full well I know, God wot, That I had been in love and he had not. And in the barley field I gleaned no more.

Mr. Lelere took a fine establishment in Chestnut street, and lived in splendid style. Emma used to ride out daily in an elegant carriage with her inlant family; and, as had long been her practice, she carefully sought out such objects of distress as she deemed it would be chartable to relieve. One day, as she was riding in the suburbs of the city, she saw a poor half-clad man lying on the ground, and a tattered child crying by his side. She directed the coachman to stop, and calling the man, inquired why be disregarded the child, and whose it was. "It is mine," said he, "I came out hoping to get a place forit in yonder house, and could not; it is almost starred, and I have not the means to procure lood for mysell or it." She gave him a small sum, and directed him to call at bet bouse the next day. He received it with tears and promised compliance. At the hour appointed, the poor man with his helpless child waited in the kitchen for the call of his benefactress. Mrs. Lefere sent for them into the breakfast room, as soon as the family dispersed, and desired to know by what means he had brought himself to poverty and want. The man spoke out honestly.
