THE MAYPERIDS,

The sen had rices, the air was sweet, And brightly shope the dew, And cheerful stends, and busy feet, Pass'd the lone meadows through; And waving like a flowers sea Of gay and spiry bloom,

The hayfields rippled metrily,

In beauty and perfuse.

I saw the early mowers pass Along the pleasant dell, And rank on rank the shining grass Around them quickly fell; I look'd and far and wide, at noon, The fallen flowers were spread; -And all, as ross the evening moon; Beneath the seythe were dead.

"All flesh is grass," the scriptures say, And so we truly find, Cut down, as in a summer's day, Are all of human kind; Some, while the morning still is fair, Taken in earliest prime; Some, mid-day's beat and burden bear, But all laid low in time.

A Suble full of truth to me Is this, the mower's tale; I soon a broken stem shell be, Like hay that strews the vale; At early dawn, or closing light, The scythe of death may fall; Then let me learn the lemon right, So full of truth to all.

Liberty of the Press.

Death is the great antagonist of life, and the cold thought of the tomb is the skeleton all at feasts. We do not want to go through the dark valley, although its passage may lead to paradise; and with Chas. Lamb we do not want to be down in the muddy grave, even with kings and princes for our bedfellows. But the hist of nature is inexorable. There is no appeal of relief from the great law which dooms us to dust. We finerish and we tade as the leaves of the lorest, and the flower that blooms and withers in a day has no frailer hold upon life than the mightiest monarch that ever shook the earth with his lootsteps.
