True Love Can See No Change

EE BY: VIOLET PULLER. W. 'Twee erening and the reey light Fell on a lady's graceful bead, And on her hand, a snowy white, Which held a letter, thus she read:

1-Beloved," the writer said, my "own, I come to thee from foreign lander And left this wealth within my hands.

'And now I come to claim my bride, Say, wilt thou ley thy Send le m.be, And trust moutaring at the side, My fetere life, through storm and ships fil hope to fad thee still the same.

And that sweet mouth, so rosy red, And that went to make thee fair-

Dear eyes that did my beart insame.

With those soft eyes of tender brown,

The passage of the weary years, The baffled hopes, the world regrets, That dim the eyes with bitter tears.

"I dare not meet him-is the face, Which once he thought soyoung and fair Of beauty he will find no trace, No lustre on the chestaut bair."

But as she sighed, a sound was heard, A well know voice spake at the door-A roice that all her pulses struck, A manly footstep trod the foor. He entered, "I am changed, I know,"

She whispered as she breathed his name; He clasped her close, "Why tremble so? Darling, to me thou art the same.

Though time may pass and years ma. roll, That bely beauty never dies. "Wher'er I went, on land or sea, What'er I saw of new or strange, Thine eyes of love still shope on me, Beleved, true leve can see no change."
