Postal Intercourse with the Rebellious Washington, August 21.—Postmaster General Blair, in response to an inquiry on the subject, says he has neither the power to interdict nor to suspend intercourse between the loyal and rebellious States by private expresses or otherwise. This power rests with the War and Treasury Departments, and so long as those Departments forbear to exercise it, correspondence between the insurgents South and their friends and abettors. North may lawfully continued. His power over the matter extends only to the protection of the revenues of the Department from fraud by the conveyance this circuitous correspondence over the post roads of the United States, partly in the mails and partly by private expresses, unlawfully. This the Postmaster General believes has been terment in and in 3, between 60 and 70, 5, between 70 and concernally done in the manner set forth in his letter between 50 and 70, 5, between 70 and concernally done in the manner set forth in his letter between 50 and 70, 5, between 70 and concernally done in the manner set forth in his letter between 50 and 70, 5, between 70 and concernally done in the manner set forth in his letter between 50 and 70, 5, between 70 and concernally done in the manner set forth in his letter between 50 and 50, 5, between 70 and 10 on the subject to General McClellan, published a few weeks ago. He concludes by saying: "You have doubtless observed that the President, in pursnance of an act of Congress passed at its recent session, has by his proclamation of the 10th instant declared that all commercial intercourse between the insurgent States, or the people thereof, and the loval States, is unlawful. It is presumed that in I structions will be issued by the Treasury Department for the due enforcement of this declaration.
