

The South.

THE WOLVES.

Ye who listen to stories told,
When hearts are cheery and nights are cold,
Of the long wood-side, and the hungry pack
That howls by the fainting traveller's track—
Flame red eyeballs, the belated sleigh—
By the winter moon, the haunted sleigh—
The lost child caught in the dismal wood,
The little shoes and the stains of blood
On the trampled snow. O ye that hear,
With thrills of pity or chills of fear,
Wishing some angel had been sent
To shield the hapless and innocent—
Know ye the fiend that is crueler far
Than the gaunt grey herbs of the forest are?
Swiftly vanish the wild fleet tracks
Before the rifle and woodland axe;
But mark the coming of man's feet,
Pattering by night through the city street!
Each wolf that dwelt in the woodland brown
Lives a spectre and haunts the town.
By square and market they stalk and prowl,
In lane and alley they leap and howl.
All night they snarl and snarl before
The poor patched window and broken door,
