> GELIVION .-- (BY J. H. MEWITT.) I beard the rolling stuffed drum, And piercing fife, as lone I stray'd; "Thus, thus," thought I, "within the tember Shall fame's sandying wreaths be laid!" Uppe a monument I saw

The hero's glorious deeds retraced; Oblivion came—I read no more, His name—his deeds were all effaced.

saw a monarch on his throne. A throne of skulls, imbrued in blood; An awful spicadour round him shone, As high be sat, "the great, the good." I waw the veil of death unfurl'd Over his stem and stately brow; Oblivion swept him from the world-Lo! where's his name, his greatness now?

I saw a bard, and o'er the lyre, His fingers swept, in thirst of figie; His soul was melting on each wire. His pen sent forth its tides of flame. I saw him write his epitaph, "Twee "dust to dust, and clay to clay;" Oblivion came-he waved his staff, And e'en that dust was swept away!

I saw the planets, moon and sun, Array'd in all their glorious light, Careering amouthly, brightly on, Pouring out lustre in their flight. Oblivion came-Creation's groan Was beard amid the crash of spheres; Worlds upon worlds were overthrown, And Time, himself, summed up his years.

We beings of a little bour! Flow rets that bloom, then cease to be, Know ye who checks Oblivion's power? He who can span infinity. And, oh! how sad it is to see So many rushing madly on, Spurning a bright eternity, To plunge in bell's Oblivion!
