Fur the Saltimore Chpper. THE CAPTIVE'S DREAM. Alone, in his dungeon cell of gloom, With his pule brow raised to the silver moon, A captive gazed on the startit sky, With a sadden'd soul-be was doom'd to die. He was doomed to die-the bears sped fast, As his mind flow back to the happy past, He thought of his high and honored name, He thought of his felon's death of shame, And bitter team fell barning there, As he raised his heart to God in prayer. The captive prayed—that secrewing tone Far on the still air floated ou-He wept, an angel beard the cry, And, wending from his place on high, Gether'd those pearls of offing meet, And laid them at the Saviour's Sert. The Eternal beard-upon the scroll, Where crimes of years had been enrolled, The smile of Jesus beamed a ray Which swept the characters away, White thro' high heaven the sweet strains ran, Porgivenere for repentant man; His mind was calm, and as he wept Those trans of p ace, the captive slept. He sicpt, and oh! what visions bright, Rese there to bless his longing sight; Far u'et the wide dark tollieg sea, That care-worn beart did onward flee, While memory led bright fancy on, And brought him to his childhood's h.mc. The sparkling river rolled along, The spring birds warbled forth their song, And hill and valley beamed as fair, As when he left them bleoming there. With gladsome heart, he bounded on, And stood beside his own hearth stone. His father's hearth—the old man smiled, To hait once more his wandering child; A sovely blue-eyed girl stood there, With ruby lips and golden hair, His playmate sister wild he presend Her young form to his beating breast; He hears a voice with music's tone, As a gentle arm is 'round him thrown, That voice oft in days gone by, Had sung is baby luliaby, It blesses now her erring son, His leved, his donling mother's own, He guzes 'fuend with wild delight, As each dear face breaks on his sight, And then, subdued by home's sweet spell, liuwa at that mother's feet he fell. While shouts of juy came praling round, To welcome back the lost one found. gtill on he slept—the mouraful sound Of the death bed's told rang o'er the ground; A smile across his features gleamed,

And the captive's soul passed as he dream'd.
