> For the Baltimore Clipber. MIDNIGHT.

Another day has pass'd to rest, Each shadow hath departed; The sun hath set in the distant west, And gone is the light that darted. The trees are still to the very leaf, And stand in silent sadness, And there is heard no sound of grief,

To steal the notes of gladness.

Silence and stars, with silvery clouds, Veils not the lovely moon; And oh! how teeming memory crowds On midpight's sullen noon. It seems the sacred bour of thought, The boly tranquil hour, Then to the bowed hushed heart is brought

God's mercy and his power. I love, when night is on the world, To bead my heart in prayer, That He in triumph may unfurl, And write my manrion there. Oh may those descling things beyond Life's purest rays that rise,

Light quick the eye and loose the bonds T. L. WISE. That still my spirit ties.
