For the Baltimore Clipper. BONG OF THE GONDOLIER. La Letty barque from Venice' tide, The shore is floating near;

> Then, leveliest, baste in it to glid., With thy blest Gondoller. The blushing moon shall guide our way.

Adjust the niltery see; Mails the sweet spice shall round me play, de thus I game on these.

I'll ming my tale of love to thee, As gaily on we steer, And thou will whisper soft to me, Thy happy Gondolier.

We'll build our cottage on the strand, And bid old care afar, -And sail thro' life thus hand in hand, Thee and thy Gondolier.

THE DOUBLE MARRIAGE.

BY THE COUNTESS D'AUTICHAMP. The political dissensions that have agitated Spain for more than twenty years, have forced many families to leave their country, and seek a more tranquil home elsewhere. Bordeaux for instance, contains more than twenty thousand Spaniards; and in this city a happy sympathy exists between the indigenous population and strangers. The Gascon character, quick, light, and resolute, blends easily with the violent passionateness of the Spaniard; and Castilian gravity equally accommodates itself with the vain frankness of the Bordelais. The demands of society and the interests of commerce have done the rest; and therefore have arisen frequent marriages, and bonds, which have all the permanency of friend-

In 18— the Countess of Alcantara came to reside at Bordeaux It was not asked whether a political or any other cause obliged her to leave | Madrid, where it appeared she was little known. She was rich, and by the retired way in which | she lived, and the care she bestowed on a young infant, she was imagined to be a widow. Her beauty, however, caused her soon to be remarked; and after she had formed some acquaintances in the town, she found it difficult to withdraw from the pursuits that await a young woman, rich withal, of whom no duty, or no protector, seems to limit the admiration. The Countess, | however, conducted herself with so much circumspection, that for three years not the remotest scandal was entertained on her account .-During that period she dressed herself in mourning, as well be all her household; but, a few | society of one of her more persevering admirers, | a certain Count de Bougignon, rich, handsome, ment. and five-and-thirty.
