NUMBER 3.

For the Baltimore Clipper.

MY SISTER'S GRAVE. Dear sister, thou art sleeping there, In all thy youthful bloom; Yet hear, Oh! hear a brother's prayer, Now breath'd benide thy tomb. Thy spotices soul will sour above,

While prayers for thee thy brother's love,

. Nor longer be earth's slave;

Will offer o'et thy grave.

Thy blooming virtues are impearl'd, Where love with all accord, And blersings of a better world, Will be thy bright reward. Thy tender years were free from care, Nor anguish ever gave,

And harmless as that emblem there, Yet weeping o'er thy grave. Dear sister, ttill thy angel form, Appears before my sight, In all its glowing beauty warm,

Through darkest shades of night. I yield for thee, my sister dear, That love kind heaven gave, Twas breath'd—and then a silent kar, Fell trembling on thy grave.

These particulars awakened my ardent curiosity to see a place which I pictured to myself the very fountain-head of certain hereditary habits land customs [prevalent among the descendants] of the original Dutch settlers of my native state. I accordingly lost no time in performing a pilgri-

Before I reached the place, I beheld symptoms little clump built boat was in full sail along the lazy bosom of a canal, but its sail consisted of the blades of two paddles stood or, end, while the navigator sat steering with a third paddle in the stern, crouched down like a toad, with a slouched hat drawn over his eyes. I presumed him to be some nautical lover, on the way to his mistress. After proceeding a little farther, I came in sight of the harbor or port of destination of this drowsy navigator. This was the Brocken-Meer, an artificial basin, or sheet of olive-green water, tranquil as a mill-pond. On this the village of Brock is situated, and the borders are laboriously decorated with flower-beds, box trees clipped into all kinds of ingenious shapes and fancies, and little

'lust' houses and pavillions. I alighted outside the village, for no horse nor i vehicle is permitted to enter its precincts, lest it should cause desilement of the well-scoured pavements. Shaking the dust off my feet, therefore, I prepared to enter, with due reverence and eircumspection, this sanctum sanctorum of Dutch cleanliness. I entered by a narrow street, paved tive place from the earliest times of New-Amwith yellow bricks, laid edgewise, and so clean were actually worm deep, not by the tread of made myself master of this precious document using the lash with one hand he held a pittel in feet, but by the friction of the scrubbing-brush.
