For the Baltimore Clipper. LINES

Hitten on being present during the Communion Bervice, at one of the Churches in Baltimore. A house of worship-and I enter'd in With seelings aw'd, and reverently bow'd, For I was thinking of the Son of God: In humble guise, on Judea's sacred coast, Ma pempous pile, no splendid building rose For him to preach the word of life therein. Meekly and mild upon the earth he stood, The arch above him, Heaven's own asure blue, No studied diction, franght with flowing tropes, Amus'd the sense or pleas'd the critic's cur-With simple truth, and yet with words of pow's, He spoke to fallen man-discoursed of love, Of Christian love, and fellowship below, Of deeds of mercy, abetinence and prayer, To fit them for his Father's house on high. Thou meek and lowly Saviour! can it be That these are thy disciples?-youder charte And splendid altar, 'round whose marble base A fair and gracious group are bowing low, Is rear'd to thee?—That boly man of God, In dress superb, is minister of thine, And now performs the ritual of the Church In memory of thee? Ye must renounce The vanities and pomps, in solemn voice he cried, Of this vain world—the devil and his works Must have no entrance here! Are ye at peace, In charity and fellowship with all? For if ye eat and drink neworthily, Ye scal the condemation of your soul. The pensive andience heard the dread appeal, And deep and oft the load responses rose. I gaz'd upon the fair communicants

Array'd in silken robes of glittering pride, And ask'd my heart, Ah, tell me what are these, But pomps and vanities of this vain world? And then methought my eye could single out Some that were not in charity with all, E'en tho' they took the consecrated bread, And press'd with awe the chalice to their lipe! Some feeling rankled in the bosoms fair, That savor'd not of love, but mark'd contempt, For those whose only fault, perchance, was this-The world's neglect, and fortune's frowns to bear! And these the world call pious, greatly good, The meck disciples of the lowly lamb, The beacon lights to gild our moral path, And lead our wayward footsteps up to Heav'n! May God forgive the bitter thoughts that rise, That deem them stumbling blocks the Church

Rocks of offence, that cause the good to err, Profesors loud, not doers of the Word! But I am wrong, that in ungracious mood, Imbibe the spirit I have just condemn'd, And weak myself, presume the weak to judge. Oh! may the prayer of mild, forgiving love. Breath'd forth in anguish from thy dying lips, Still find acceptance at the throne of God-

For the Baltimore Clipper. FEMALE SOCIETY—TEMPERANCE.

It is much to be regretted that there are so few young gentlemen who participate to any great extent in the society of the respectable and virtuous of the other sex. There are many causes which tend to produce habits calculated to drive the young man from the society of ladies, one of these causes is the fastidiousness of many ladies in the selection of their male acquaintance. Not content with equality of station in society, many go so far as to make objections to shape, dress, voice and features: these, with the exception of dress, are irremediable, and therefore to reject the society of any young man on such account is ridiculous. Dress if genteel is better than dandyism; and manners if polite and well bred are preferable to foppery-intelligence will easily supply the place of large whiskers, mustache and imperiale, and sensible and rational conversation will readily fill that of exquisitism, and leave something to boot. If, therefore, ladies would banish their predilections and display less preference for the two latter as well as numerous other absurdities, and encourage sterling worth, dirested of useless appliances, they would not only enhance their earn enjoyments, but display much discretion. They would eventually produce more happiness among themselves, and encourage young gentlemen to court their society more exicusively.

The triumphant advancement of the cause of temperance must necessarily work an entire change in the pursuits of many young men during their leisure hours, and lead them to seek out furnish abundant employment of the most instructive character-but this will not suffice. This kind of occupation is too confining—the mind wants more variety, and cannot suddenly relinquish old pursuits of an active nature and tie itself down to ann-species of recreation. What then can offer greater inducements to the young man at a loss bow to spend a part of his leisure time, and pledged to shun the places where he formerly rescried, and which perhaps he still has a yearning for from long and intimate association, than the society of the respectable, virtuous and | intelligent of the other sex? and he will avai himself of the pleasures to be derived from intercourse with such society, if he knows that he will be received and welcomed there if deserving. To the young ladies, then, of our city, belongs the privilege of lending their assistance in consumating this glorious and humane enterprise, the benefits flowing from which will not the confined entirely to either sex—and apart sented from. satisfaction of feeling the friumph of higher, nobler, purer and more philanthropic motives, over considerations of a merely selfish nature.
