For the Baltimore Clipper.

TO M— L— Each ling'ring hour, which o'er me hangs, Until once more, I gaze on thee, Coavers with it the deepest pangs, And steeps my soul in misery. How oft 'is said, that while we hold Possession of an object dear, Our scelings pall, and e'en grow cold, To view that object always near. But when 'tis placed so far away, As not to meet our eager view, How then we yearn, both night and day, Our former union to renew. Thus when I'm far removed from thee,

And can no more thy features trace,

And former joys, once more, embrace-

She was a lone widow. Her staff, her support, on whom she had leaned so long and so constantly, in storm and in sunshine, was taken away, and she was left to battle with the world's sorrows, and deceits, and vanitiesalone! Her gude man' was her elder, by a score of summers. He was not made of iron, take care of that, and he was a skilful lawthough some folks might have thought it. He had his own troubles, and he sank beneath which hovered over her brow, and the sun them at a good old age. It was a sad scene shone brighter, and the birds sang sweeter, presented at his death-bed. Not a child looked on to witness the last moments, or to receive the last blessing, of a parent. But she alone, the wife of his bosom, hung over his pillow, convulsed and sobbing. He grasped her hand—he raised his eyes imploringly—his forgotten the vow which was interrupted lips moved—they uttered a few words almost only by sobs,' she had taken that skillul inarticulate-and they were burdened with a request --- that she would never be married to unother.
